

INTERNAL ARMED CONFLICT IN THE PHILIPPINES AND THE QUEST FOR PEACE IN THE PERIOD OF DEMOCRATIC TRANSITION

By EDMUNDO GARCIA

Armed Conflicts in the Third World

There are relatively few studies on conflict resolution in the Third World. Given the importance of internal armed conflict in countries of the Third World, this situation would suggest that a reduction of political and military tension in diverse regions of conflict would greatly contribute to the process of global peace. At the same time, this effort would help bring about the realization of a collective aspiration for peace especially in those areas where there is a clamor for popular participation and economic development. Besides, it has become increasingly clear that wars in the Third World are generally prolonged and indecisive: Wars in the Third World seldom resolve the issues for which they were begun.

It is for these reasons that a study on the resolution of internal armed conflict in a Third World country like the Philippines becomes relevant. The origins of the conflict are historical, its nature structural and its consequences complex. Yet, precisely because the Filipino people put down a dictatorship and embarked on the path towards democratization it is worth asking how they can now best build a just society which alone makes possible the attainment of lasting peace. It is equally relevant to explore how a people can resolve their differences while respecting human rights; how a nation can achieve development while respecting the rights of minorities; how a society can ensure justice for all under the rule of law guided by a vision that will empower the majority who are powerless and poor.

The fall of authoritarian rulers in the Philippines and various countries in Latin America during the mid-1980s raised expectations that long-standing internal armed conflicts could finally be resolved and lasting peace achieved. The advent of civilian rule seemed to have brought about an end to the politics of repression and the militarization of politics that had characterized a number of Third World countries during the past three decades. The political upheavals also focused attention on the profound causes of social unrest in these countries: massive poverty, social inequality
