

Clearly, if the papers in the book fail to convince me of the reality of the 'transfer effect', the remaining questions of specificity and the nature of the substance or substances that mediate the transfer are superfluous. There is even considerable disagreement among the authors in the book as to the chemical nature of the transfer substance.

Despite this rather negative reaction to the main theme of the book I urge all interested in the process of learning to read the book to judge for themselves. It is well produced and there are some excellent discussions, for example on the specificity of 'transfer effect' were it to be proved (Golub and McConnell) or the refreshingly undogmatic paper by Krech and Bennett. There are also some rather unhappy ones—notably that by Reinis 'A derepressor hypothesis of memory transfer'. The results of this particular paper seem to add up to the rather obvious conclusion that if you make an animal feel ill, its learning performance diminishes. A critical review of Ungar's work recently appeared in Nature (242, 60–62, 1973) and I feel that much of the criticism expressed in that article is justified.

It is a pity that the Editor chose to include material from only one field of investigation into the phenomena of learning and memory. If some of the more recent neurophysiological, neuropharmacological, and neurochemical experiments had also been included it would have been a more satisfactory book. In conclusion, this is a controversial book on an important subject and I urge all interested to read it and judge for themselves.

C. D. RICHARDS

PSYCHIATRISTS IN TRAINING: The Report of the Royal Medico-Psychological Association's Manpower and Education Project By Peter Brook. (Pp. 163; £2.00.) Headley Bros. The Invicta Press: Ashford, Kent. 1973.

One of the last actions of the Royal Medico-Psychological Association before it made way for the Royal College of Psychiatrists was the setting up, through its Education Committee, of a working party charged with examining the current state and the future requirements of psychiatric manpower. This working party was in turn responsible for a study, conducted by Dr. Peter Brook, which aimed to establish how psychiatric training was functioning, how efficiently trainees considered that they were being taught, and how well their seniors believed that they were doing the teaching. The study involved trainees, tutors, and consultants in the Oxford, Manchester, and South-East Metropolitan Regions.

It is something of an irony that the results of this study were being pieced together at the same time as the columns of the Lancet reverberated to the persistent criticisms by junior psychiatrists concerning the inadequacy of psychiatric training facilities and the equally insistent denials of those who should have known better that the situation was as bad as the disparagingly-labelled 'radicals' claimed. That the situation is every bit as bad and worse is laid out with considerable industry and care in this report. Those assertions concerning the deplorable lack of facilities, the inadequacy of clinical teaching, and the dearth of research opportunities—patronisingly dismissed at the time as the understandable manifestations of examination nerves and 'explained' as the inevitable teething troubles of a new college—are now shown to have been accurate, representative if understated accounts of the true position.

It is difficult to believe two years and many meetings later that many will find Brook's dismal catalogue surprising, yet some of his most striking findings bear repetition. One-quarter of the trainee psychiatrists who had graduated overseas did not regard themselves as committed to psychiatry and over one-third of these had come to Britain with no intention whatsoever of entering psychiatry.

Henry Miller's dictum that the hospital service operates 'by courtesy of the medical schools of Madras and Bombay' is particularly applicable to psychiatry—the majority of overseas trainees being seduced into the peripheral hospitals and those areas of psychiatric practice, such as subnormality, psychogeriatrics, and the care of the chronically ill, which are especially avoided by the home-trained graduates who pick and choose their posts or go back into general practice, general medicine, or to more lucrative and rewarding areas further afield.

No doubt as Brook was putting the finishing touches to his section on the trainees' assessments of their programmes, the College mandarins were sagaciously constructing their membership examination. How else could such a perfect marriage of experience and assessment be obtained? Less than two-fifths of the trainees were satisfied with their training in psychotherapy. Only one-third had had sufficient exposure to behaviour therapy techniques to enable them to use such methods in practice. Half the trainees received no training whatsoever in the management of alcoholism and of the addictions and the situation with regard to experience and training in forensic psychiatry, psychogeriatrics, and subnormality was even worse. The finding that almost two-thirds of the registrars and senior registrars sampled were extremely dissatisfied with their experience in community psychiatry bodes ill for the Department of Health and Social Security and its enthusiastic crusade to turn every psychiatrist into a catchment area coordinator.

Inevitably, there will be those who express sceptic-
