Abstract

We describe the mixed-methods (qualitative and quantitative) development and preliminary validation of the Patient Assessment for Low Back Pain-Symptoms (PAL-S), a patient-reported outcome measure for use in chronic low back pain (cLBP) clinical trials. Qualitative methods (concept elicitation and cognitive interviews) were used to identify and refine symptom concepts and quantitative methods (classical test theory and Rasch measurement theory) were used to evaluate item- and scale-level performance of the measure using an iterative approach. Patients with cLBP participated in concept elicitation interviews (N = 43), cognitive interviews (N = 38), and interview-based assessment of paper-to-electronic mode equivalence (N = 8). A web-based sample of patients with self-reported cLBP participated in quantitative studies to evaluate preliminary (N = 508) and revised (N = 401) drafts and a physician-diagnosed cohort of patients with cLBP (N = 45) participated in preliminary validation of the measure. The PAL-S contained 14 items describing symptoms (overall pain, sharp, pricking, sensitive, tender, radiating, shocking, shooting, burning, squeezing, muscle spasms, throbbing, aching, and stiffness). Item-level performance, scale structure, and scoring seemed to be appropriate. One-week test-retest reproducibility was acceptable (intraclass correlation coefficient 0.81 [95% confidence interval, 0.61–0.91]). Convergent validity was demonstrated with total score and MOS-36 Bodily Pain (Pearson correlation = 0.79), Neuropathic Pain Symptom Inventory (0.73), Roland-Morris Disability Questionnaire (0.67), and MOS-36 Physical Functioning (−0.65). Individual item scores and total score discriminated between numeric rating scale tertile groups and painDETECT categories. Respondent interpretation of paper and electronic administration modes was equivalent. The PAL-S has demonstrated content validity and is potentially useful to assess treatment benefit in cLBP clinical trials.

1. Introduction

Low back pain (LBP), generally described as pain, muscle tension, or muscle stiffness with or without radiation to the distal lower extremity, is the second most common cause of disability among adults in the United States.<sup>10</sup> Although acute and subacute episodes (those lasting up to 3 months) are the most common presentations of LBP, chronic low back pain (cLBP) is associated with long-term pain and disability.<sup>18</sup>

Pain has been described as one of the most important domains to be assessed in LBP, along with back-specific function, genetic health status, work disability, and patient satisfaction.<sup>1,10,19</sup> Pain is one of the best determinants of disability due to cLBP,<sup>4,10,20,21</sup> and is predictive of work resumption within the year after related short-term absence.<sup>2,22</sup> Although pain and function are interdependent parts of the patient experience, patients often seek care because of pain, and this variable therefore needs to be assessed at baseline and in response to treatment. Because the severity of cLBP symptoms is often related to the degree of impairment that patients experience, the assessment of this concept is an essential endpoint for clinical studies. Pain-related function/impairment is an outcome that should also be assessed.

Although various patient-reported outcome (PRO) instruments have been used in cLBP clinical trials, many present pain as a single overall concept, which may not fully capture the pain sensations of cLBP. The use of multidimensional pain assessments that encompass pain-related physical function and psychological factors is recommended to evaluate chronic pain.<sup>18,23</sup> We conducted a review of existing instruments that are currently used to collect patient-reported concepts of pain
