

THE ROLE OF SILVICULTURE IN ECOSYSTEM MANAGEMENT

JAMES STEWART

DEPARTMENT OF RENEWABLE RESOURCES
UNIVERSITY OF ALBERTA, EDMONTON, ALBERTA

Abstract: The move toward ecosystem management is redefining the goals for forest management in Alberta. Issues of sustainability and biodiversity require that we deal with forests as ecosystems and landscapes. However, the primary unit of management activity is the stand, and the manipulation of the stand to produce a forest is the realm of silviculture. As under previous management systems, silviculturists will be called upon to produce stands of particular compositions and structures in order to meet the goals of ecosystem management. While the structure and composition of the desired stands may differ from those of the past, the basic techniques for stand manipulation have not changed. The "new" role for silviculture will be in the application of alternative silvicultural systems in areas where they have not previously been used and in the refinement of their use to match the biological and physical conditions of our forests. Our research is investigating the critical ecological relationships which determine forest stand dynamics in the boreal mixedwood, including the factors affecting white spruce dispersal and establishment in forests, the role of light and seedbed properties in determining understory composition, and the effectiveness of low impact silvicultural manipulations in guiding stand development. This knowledge will be used to support an operational test of alternative silvicultural systems to be set up in Alpac's FMA area. A diversity of silvicultural tools and methods is required to meet the diverse goals of ecosystem management.

As stated, the title of my talk is "The Role of Silviculture in Ecosystem Management". This was originally co-authored with Vic Leiffers who is the Project Leader of our group at the U of A. However, I have rewritten this a couple of times since his input.

I suppose most of you who came here, especially to the implementation workshop, are seeking some sort of answer as to how are we actually going to do this ecosystem management thing. Unfortunately, I do not have any real answers for you, but I think I can show you some direction that we are moving in.

The Task of Silviculture

The move towards ecosystem management is shifting our focus from components to whole systems, from stands and cutblocks to whole ecosystems and landscapes. What role will silviculture play under this new ecological paradigm of forest management? Ecosystem management will require information gathering and planning at landscape and larger levels, but it will not mean a lessening of the importance of silviculture and operations at the stand level.

After all, what makes a forest a forest? What component determines the major mass and energy fluxes in the ecosystem of the forest? What is the major source of pattern and structure of the forest? The answer to all these questions, of course, is trees. In all of our ecologically based management activities the primary constituent which we are going to be manipulating is the tree, or more accurately, stands of trees.
