- A decreasing emphasis on leaders and an increasing prominence of multi-stakeholder, shared governance regimes that favour effective stewardship;
- An increasing number and frequency of self-organizing groups that operate at scales from local to multi-national to global, and where the participants may be willing to resolve their issues without necessarily having to involve national governments;
- Creating a generation of global citizens who are willing to assume ownership of their lives and contribute to making a collective difference by sharing with others;
- Emphasizing the direct participation of citizens in: the formation of national and international policies; in service delivery; in monitoring and accountability; and in ways that are ongoing; and
- A new model of global governance that focuses on a future that all of humanity is prepared to live into, & not just trying to address past grievances or current wrongdoings
