

Remedies of international Human Rights Law

Remedies in international human rights law refer to the measures and mechanisms available to individuals and groups whose human rights have been violated. These remedies aim to provide justice, accountability and redress for the violations suffered.

Major international and regional human rights treaties demand an effective remedy be available for individual victims of human rights violations. A remedy involves two elements: a victim's access to the appropriate authorities to have his claim fairly heard and decided; and the redress or relief that he can receive.

The right to an effective remedy is the right of a person whose human rights have been violated to legal remedy. Such a remedy must be accessible, binding, capable of bringing perpetrators to justice, provide appropriate reparations, and prevent further violations of the person's rights. The right to an effective remedy guarantees the individual the ability to seek remedy from the state directly rather than through an international process. The right to an effective remedy is commonly recognized as a human right in international human rights instruments.

To ensure enforcement of human rights obligations, various mechanisms exist at national, regional and international levels. At the international level, most of these mechanisms provide vehicles for monitoring compliance. Some offer petition procedures which allow individuals to challenge breaches by the state of their human rights obligations. In some cases, mechanisms are linked to constitutions and national legislation, in others to human rights treaties and in still others to specialized agencies of the UN charged with the enforcement of specific rights, such as labor refugee and health rights. Mechanisms linked to national constitutions and legislation may offer more concrete and enforceable remedies and should usually be tried first, before turning to international petition procedures.

OBLIGATIONS AFTER HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES

Transitional justice experts generally identify four important state obligations in violations of human rights:

- 1- Full exploration of the truth,
- 2- Prosecution,
- 3-Reparations, that respect the dignity of each beneficiary, and
- 4- Reforms of state laws and institutions.

ICTJ uses its global network and in-depth comparative experience to advise victims, communities, and policymakers on best practice and real-life challenges when developing policies to meet these obligations.

A remedy must be accessible, binding, capable of bringing offenders to justice, provide appropriate reparations, and prevent further violations of the person's rights. The right to an effective remedy guarantees the individual the ability to
