

FIGURE 3.21 Illustration of how a magma evolves as the earliest-formed minerals (those richer in iron, magnesium, and calcium) crystallize and settle to the bottom of the magma chamber, leaving the remaining melt richer in sodium, potassium, and silica (SiO_2). A. Emplacement of a magma body and associated igneous activity generates rocks having a composition similar to that of the initial magma. B. As the magma cools, magmatic differentiation (crystallization and settling) change the composition of the remaining melt, generating rocks having a composition quite different than the original magma. C. Further magmatic differentiation results in another, more highly evolved melt with its associated rock types.

tends to generate evolved silica-rich felsic melts of low density that can rise toward the top of the magma chamber. The result is a compositionally zoned magma reservoir with dense, basaltic melt stratified below less dense, silica-rich melt.

Assimilation and Magma Mixing

Bowen successfully demonstrated that through magmatic differentiation a parent magma can generate several mineralogically different igneous rocks. However, more recent work indicates that magmatic differentiation cannot, by itself, account for the entire compositional spectrum of igneous rocks.

Once a magma body forms its composition can also change through the incorporation of foreign material. For example, as magma migrates through the crust, it may incorporate some of the surrounding host rock, a process called assimilation (FIGURE 3.22A). In a near-surface environment, where rocks are brittle, magma causes numerous cracks in the overlying rock as it pushes upward. The force of the injected magma is often sufficient to dislodge blocks of "foreign" rock, which melt and are incorporated into the magma body.

Another means by which the composition of magma can be altered is magma mixing. This process occurs when one magma body intrudes another that has a different composition (Figure 3.22C). Once combined, convective flow may stir the two magmas and generate a mass having a composition that is a blend of the two. Magma mixing may occur during the ascent of two chemically distinct magma bodies as the more buoyant mass overtakes the more slowly moving mass.

DID YOU KNOW?

Although the United States is the largest consumer of industrial diamonds it has no commercial source of this mineral. It does, however, manufacture large quantities of synthetic diamonds for industrial use.

FIGURE 3.22 This illustration shows three ways that the composition of a magma body may be altered: A. Assimilation of host rock; B. Crystallization and settling (magmatic differentiation); and C. Magma mixing.
