

When, near the end of the ten long years, the Trojans found an enormous wooden horse that the Greeks left them as an offering, to bring their gods and celebrate the end of the war, Helen guessed that Greek warriors were hiding inside. Though it spelled the end of Troy, she didn't say word to anyone.

The next morn she found the news among the Trojans, Hector and Paris, were already dead. What did it matter to her if the city was destroyed? If Menelaos got his revenge and killed her? Destiny, which reigns over gods and men alike, would decide!

But when Menelaos found her in the rubble of the burning city, her clothes torn, face blackened by soot and covered in tears – but still beautiful – his heart softened.

He brought her back with him to Sparta, where she found her daughter and lived in peace for many more years.
