ABSTRACT

Background: Individuals undergoing training in competitive sports are required to deal with various challenges such as real and perceived pressures to perform and invest sustained efforts in rigorous training regimens. Global literature indicates successful inclusion of psychological components in the training of sportspersons. It is well recognized that training programs need to be designed keeping in view the local contextual factors as well as felt needs. However, there are very few studies from India that have explored felt needs of individuals training in competitive sports. Aim: The study was conducted to explore felt needs for psychological inputs in youth selected for training in various sports by the Youth Empowerment and Sports Department, Government of Karnataka. Method: The sample composed of 166 youth (males = 98 females = 68), aged between 16 and 21 years, residing in state sports hostels of Bengaluru and Mysuru and undergoing training in competitive sports. A ten-item survey prepared based on the literature review, and a pilot study was used to assess felt needs for training in psychological aspect for performance enhancement. Results: Learning ways to maintain motivation for sports practice despite ups and downs in performance/other obstacles, maintaining self-esteem, managing disappointments, managing anger, and handling stress related to injuries received highest endorsements (75% or more) as strong felt needs in the overall sample. Only a few differences emerged between genders and age groups. Conclusion: The study has implications for integrating psychological training into the routine training of young sportspersons engaged in competitive sports.

Keywords: Enhancing performance, felt needs, sports

The word competition is defined as “a situation in which someone is trying to win something or be more successful than someone else.”^[1] As such, competitive sports can be any form of sports where one individual or a team tries to win against another individual or a team, thus experiencing a demand to excel and outperform.

The importance of psychological factors in determining the level of performance by athletes is widely recognized by coaches, athletes, and laypersons. Further, the role of psychological factors in sports performance has also been systematically examined in the scientific literature. For example, one study reported that most athletes believe that a minimum of 50% of the course of a good game is the result of mental or psychological factors.^[2] Despite this belief, it is observed that the actual practice of such mental skills is not on par with the perceived importance. For instance, one study found that most athletes used only 5%–10% of the entire training time for learning such skills.^[3] For the last few decades, especially with the evolution of the field of sports psychology, there have been a number of studies to understand such psychological factors that provide the “edge” for individuals’ participating in various competitive sports.
