Abstract

The 4th International melanoma congress of the Society for Melanoma Research (SMR), organized by Marianne Berwick (University of New Mexico), Paul Chapman (Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center), Rene Gonzalez (University of Colorado) and Ze'ev Ronai (Burnham Institute), was held at the Marriott Hotel in downtown New York on November 2007. The congress was attended by a record high number of attendees (over 500 delegates) who joined to discuss recent advances in melanoma biology and therapy. About 40% of the participants arrived from 39 countries, a testament to the high impact of this annual gathering on the international melanoma community. Over 120 of the participants were students or postdoctoral fellows, representing a most impressive fraction of young scientists engaged in melanoma research. The meeting consisted of more than 50 plenary and minisymposia presentations, stimulating the exchange of unpublished data and novel ideas, and helping to forge new collaborations that are anticipated to facilitate significant advances in basic, translational and clinical melanoma research. Another major focus of this meeting was over 160 posters, which were heavily attended and provided an effective forum for extensive informal discussions. This report will highlight the major scientific themes and advances of this most successful meeting, and provide a useful perspective on the current state of melanoma research, as well as where the field should be heading.

Day 1/Keynote Address. Speaker: Boris Bastian

Dr. Bastian (University of California at San Francisco, San Francisco, CA) was selected as the keynote speaker for this congress based on his seminal contribution to the melanoma field over the past decade, with important findings highlighting the genetic differences between melanoma subtypes. In his presentation Dr. Bastian showed that melanomas with BRAF mutations differed in their histomorphology from melanomas without such mutations, a finding that could be used to improve the current classification of melanoma to incorporate therapeutically relevant genetic findings. As a follow-up to his prior discovery that KIT is mutant and/or amplified in certain melanoma types, he presented a patient with metastatic mucosal melanoma and a KIT mutation, who showed a major clinical response to imatinib. Dr. Bastian also presented a discovery made in collaboration with Catherine van Raamsdonk and Greg Bensch, that oncogenic mutations in GNAQ are found in over 80% of blue nevi and about 50% of uveal melanomas. GNAQ is a G-protein of the alpha-q family that acts downstream of G-protein coupled receptors. Expression of the mutant protein in immortalized melanocytes was sufficient to induce the transformed phenotypes, with an efficiency comparable to mutant NRAS. GNAQ mutations led to activation of the MAP-kinase pathway and the observation that mutations are mutually exclusive with KIT, BRAF and NRAS indicate that mutant GNAQ may have partially overlapping roles in melanocyte transformation. Dr. Bastian also presented the development of a FISH assay designed to detect chromosomal aberrations in melanocytic tumors. This test was developed based on his group's finding of different patterns of
