

Reproduction and Succession: Studies in Anthropology, Law and Society. By Robin Fox. Pp. 269. (Transaction Publishers, New Brunswick, 1993.) £30.95.

Fox's book is thought provoking and highly readable. It consists of four separate essays, whose underlying theme focuses on the potential conflicts between kinship relations and the state. He synthesises material from modern American court cases, ethnography, and ancient literature to look at the strength of kinship ties and how such ties may come into conflict with the type of ideology which dominates state based societies. The general message is that despite the state's attempt to limit the power of kinship groups, such kinship structures have always been important. Fox uses social and biological data to look at why this might be so. His ability to integrate the traditionally separate perspectives of social and biological anthropology is stimulating. It provides a breath of fresh air to those who are used to the debate being pitched in the fruitless term of biological explanations versus social ones.

The book is divided into two sections: 'reproduction' and 'succession'. In the introduction to 'reproduction' Fox discusses the role of the anthropologist in policy making, in which modern anthropologists have little influence. However, in the chapters that follow he convincingly shows how a biosocial perspective could contribute to modern debates regarding an individual's rights to reproduce, and the structure of the modern family. He does this by discussing two recent court cases, one concerning the rights of Mormons to practise polygamous marriage, and the other concerning a surrogate mother who refused to give up her baby at birth.

The first chapter discusses the case of a Mormon police officer who was sacked for admitting that he had married two women. The officer tried to fight his dismissal by taking the state government to court. Fox points out that polygamy is one of several normal human mating patterns, and he argues that there is no intrinsic reason why it should be any more detrimental to human society than any other, including monogamy. Much of the chapter is a description of the state court's objections to polygamy and, although interesting, I felt it would have been valuable if Fox had extended his anthropological discussion of polygamy to the environments that favour the practice, and expanded on the deeper reasons for the state's objection to polygamy, in terms of the formation of powerful kinship groups.

However in the following chapter, Fox brilliantly applies biosocial reasoning to the issue of parenthood in a world of new reproductive technologies. Specifically he examines how these technologies can bring the fundamental mother-child relationship into conflict with the modern commercially dominated ideology which treats the 'contract' as virtually sacrosanct. He focuses on the case of a woman who having agreed to be a surrogate mother, refuses to keep her side of the contract and give up her child at birth. Fox argues that much thinking is not sophisticated enough to deal with these problems rationally, and he brings his wealth of biosocial knowledge to bear on this issue.

This was the strongest chapter of the book and the most successful in synthesising the insights of biological and social anthropology. Fox addressed seemingly unconnected issues such as the biology of mother-child bonding, and the role of class and status in our society to produce a thought provoking and far sighted analysis of the problems raised by the new reproductive technologies. This shows the important
