Operations Research and Optimization in Energy System Transition

Introduction

The transition to a sustainable and decarbonized energy system has become an urgent global imperative. With the increasing awareness of the detrimental effects of greenhouse gas emissions and the finite nature of fossil fuel resources, there is a growing need to shift towards renewable energy sources and optimize energy systems for improved sustainability. This research proposal aims to contribute to this important endeavor by investigating the application of operations research and optimization techniques in supporting the energy system transition.

Operations research and optimization techniques offer powerful tools for addressing complex decision-making problems in various domains, including energy systems. These methodologies enable us to model, analyze, and optimize the allocation of scarce resources, the coordination of different components, and the overall operation of the energy system. By leveraging these techniques, we can develop effective strategies that consider multiple objectives, such as cost minimization, emission reduction, and system reliability.

Resource allocation is a critical aspect of the energy system transition. With the integration of renewable energy sources, energy storage systems, and electric vehicles, it becomes essential to optimize their utilization and coordination to maximize their benefits. Operations research methodologies can help identify the optimal mix of energy resources, determine the most efficient allocation of generation capacities, and optimize the deployment of energy storage systems to balance supply and demand and enhance grid stability.

Demand response, which involves adjusting electricity consumption in response to price signals or grid conditions, is another crucial component of a sustainable energy system. By utilizing operations research techniques, we can optimize the participation and scheduling of flexible loads and distributed energy resources, such as rooftop solar panels and electric vehicle charging stations. This optimization enables demand response programs to effectively manage peak demand, reduce stress on the grid, and support the integration of intermittent renewable energy sources.

Research Objectives

a) Develop optimization models and algorithms for resource allocation in the energy system transition:

1. Investigate the challenges and complexities associated with resource allocation in the energy system transition, considering factors such as renewable energy integration, demand fluctuations, and grid stability.
2. Design and implement optimization models using software tools such as GAMS (General Algebraic Modeling System) or AMPL (A Mathematical Programming Language).
