

Youth Suicide: New Research Focuses On a Growing Social Problem

The increase in suicides in young people, mostly in white males, is tied not only to high rates of drug abuse and conduct disorders, but also to previously unrecognized depression

THE rate of suicide among young people has tripled in the past 30 years. Most affected are males between 20 and 24, for whom the rate peaked at 27.8 per 100,000 in 1980, compared with 11.9 for the general population. While the increase in drug and alcohol abuse is a highly relevant factor, it is more a symptom than an explanation of the problem.

Research on youth suicide is an emerging field whose development has accompanied the growing recognition that children are as vulnerable to depression and despair as adults—a recognition delayed by the powerful sway of Freudian psychodynamic theories. Notions of etiology are yet murky, and different professionals emphasize different aspects of the psychopathologies involved. Data on unsuccessful suicide attempts are skimpy and uncertain, so it is not clear to what extent the psychological problems of "attempters" resemble those of the "completers."

According to psychiatrist Donald J. Cohen, director of Yale University's Child Study Center, there are at least three basic patterns for youth suicides. The majority are those with conduct disorders, usually mixed with drug abuse—the typical pattern for males. Then there is a group of "pure" depressives, usually females. And there is a third group, also primarily male, of hard-driving perfectionists, socially inhibited and prone to extreme anxiety in the face of any social or academic challenge.

Efforts are now under way to identify specifically the psychosocial, emotional, and possible biological roots of suicide among youth.

At the University of Kentucky, psychiatrist Mohammad Shafii has been conducting a project involving "psychological autopsies" of youth suicides. This approach has been used in adults, but this study is the first to include a control group, says Shafii. "Controls, closely matched for age, sex, race, education, religion, and family income, were selected from friends of the victims and also were found to have a lot of problems.

The study examined the lives of 21 of the 27 youths who had killed themselves in the county between 1980 and 1983. All but two were males. From interviews with families, friends, teachers, and other contacts, the researchers determined that 95% of the victims had at least one psychiatric disorder according to the psychiatric diagnostic manual (DSM-III), in contrast with 48% of the controls. They had undergone significantly more psychosocial stress and had undergone significantly more deterioration in functioning than the controls during the year before their deaths. About 70% were alcohol or drug abusers and 76% were on the self instead of others, the study found that "a large number of victims had also been destructive toward others." This has also been confirmed by data from the National Institute of Mental Health's 1983 Epidemiological Catchment Study. According to sociologist Lee N. Robins of Washington University in St. Louis, who has been analyzing the data, "suicide and violence are closely linked."

Shafii's findings also downplay the idea that attempters constitute a separate group from the completers: it found that 85% of the study group had talked about their intent in one way or another, and 40% had

Suicide does not occur on the spur of the moment but is the final outcome of "serious emotional disorders which, in most cases, were not recognized or not treated," says Shafii. "Talk of suicide should be taken seriously."

diagnosed as depressed (24% of the controls had a mood disorder). Seventy percent were in trouble with the law or had manifested other signs of antisocial behavior. And 65% had what the researchers labeled "inhibited" personalities—meaning they were rigid, perfectionistic, and tended to isolate themselves.

The study undermines some popular ideas about youth suicide. Says Shafii: "we believe that completed suicide in children and adolescents does not occur on the spur of the moment or as an impulsive act of an otherwise healthy child" who is reacting to a personal crisis. In almost all cases, he says, suicide is the final outcome of "serious emotional disorders which, in most cases, were not recognized or not treated." Although some professionals have characterized the act as a case of turning aggression made a prior attempt. "Talk [of suicide] should be taken very seriously," says Shafii. "A very direct relationship exists between the talkers and the doers."

Another much larger psychological autopsy study, conducted by psychiatrist David Shaffer of Columbia University, downplays the role of depression and emphasizes the connection with impulsivity and antisocial behavior. He is currently analyzing data on the lives of 160 youths aged 19 and under who killed themselves in the 2 years before 31 May 1986 in the greater New York area. Eighty percent were males. Data on families, backgrounds, drug abuse, and psychopathology are being compared with data from a group of normal controls as well as that from a group of suicide attempters matched for age, race, and sex.
