

Introduction

*"Sharing the traumatic experience with others is a precondition for the restoration of a meaningful world."*¹

The use of torture is a pervasive and pressing problem around the world. Amnesty International² reported that at least 112 countries are estimated to utilize forms of torture against their citizenry. A recent meta-analysis by the Center for Victims of Torture³ suggests that there may be as many as 1.5 million torture survivors currently living in the United States. The consequences of torture extend well beyond the reach of the individual survivor and have a deeply polluting effect on society as a whole. As Mpaunde and colleagues⁴ said when referring to torture and violence in South Africa, "Actions, both violent and intimidating, are intended to create a polarized and dysfunctional society. Violence and conflict affect the way people relate to each other, the way organizations function, and their relationships. Families fragment and support structures become less effective, or even become sources of stress and violence" (p.188).

In addition to mental health symptoms such as Post Traumatic Stress Disorder, anxiety, and depression,⁵⁻¹¹ as well as migration and resettlement issues, such as acculturation, under- or unemployment, and unstable housing, among other issues, torture survivors describe a number of social and interpersonal problems. This often includes a sense of social dislocation, loss of trust in others, and grief resulting from the loss of meaningful roles and connection to community.^{1, 5, 6, 11-17} Group treatment has been described as a promising approach for reducing trauma-related symptoms and uniquely suited to address and foster positive changes in social and interpersonal well-being.^{1, 5, 6, 9, 10, 18, 19}

The main purpose of this article, therefore, is to examine the literature on group therapy models for torture survivors. As will be discussed in greater depth, the literature on group treatment for torture survivors is limited at this time, with a predominance of pieces on clinical practice. This review is therefore primarily intended for practitioners who are working with torture survivors in exile or in resettlement. As part of our analysis, we consider key practice issues in the literature including the rationale for group treatment and approaches to and outcomes associated with group-based interventions. Although few in number and arguably limited in extent, we also review the empirical studies that exist on group treatment with attention to methodological approaches, measurement tools utilized, and key findings. For researchers and practitioners alike, this article provides a picture of the current state of the research literature on group treatment for survivors of torture, including the fact that there are very few, methodologically-rigorous studies at this time and even fewer that utilize an experimental design. In this way, the review also highlights opportunities that exist to strengthen the research in this area.

The genesis of this literature review comes from the work of the two U.S.-based national technical assistance providers: the National Capacity Building Project at the Center for Victims of Torture – working with all torture survivor rehabilitation programs – and the National Partnership for Community Training of Gulf Coast Jewish Family and Community Services – working with refugee-service organizations on mental health actions.

This review is organized into seven main sections. Initially, we provide an overview of "Getting Better" After Torture from the Perspective of the Survivor Brian Louis Isakson, 2008 The traditional model of Western mental health treatment for survivors of torture has focused mainly on posttraumatic stress disorder and related conditions This model is symptoms focused in which the goal is to reduce pathology In this model the mental health professional is the expert and the survivors learn from the professionals Using grounded theory methodology the current study seeks to expand the understanding for treatment of torture survivors by investigating from the perspective of the torture survivors the process of getting better after torture By asking the survivors to explain this process this study broadens the focus of areas of healing and intervention to include social psychological political and biological aspects of their lives that need to be impacted in order for them to get better Eleven adult torture survivors 9 men and 2 women from various African and Asian countries described their process of getting better through qualitative interviews A model of getting better was developed to describe this process The central phenomenon of this process is moving on from difficult past experiences Participants described a multi dimensional process that includes various environmental factors and intrapersonal beliefs and coping strategies that promoted moving on and getting better These multi dimensional themes include using belief and value systems establishing safety and stability and establishing social support in order to move on Once the survivors felt a sense of safety and support they felt empowered to take action to move on from their past. These action strategies include disclosing torture experiences, controlling memories, supporting others, and utilizing available supports. Moving on led to improved relationships, more adaptive functioning, improved health, and release from emotional pain. Findings of this study were consistent with current literature documenting recovery after torture and other traumatic experiences. Implications for both theory and practice are discussed, and directions for future research are delineated.
