

Gerontologic Nursing

In 2019, the number of people aged 60 years and older was 1 billion. This number will increase to 1.4 billion by 2030 and 2.1 billion by 2050. In 2018, World Health Organization (WHO, 2018) has made recommendations for healthy aging and has designed actions that are evidence-based policies for older persons. In the United States, the number of people 65 and older has increased steadily and the life expectancy of older people continues to increase to more than 600,000 by 2060 or 1% of the total population ("Aging & Health..." 2019).

The concept of aging has been defined as young-old (65 to 74), middle-old (75 to 84), old-old (over 85), elite-old (over 90), centenarian (100+), and super-centenarian (110+). Because the aging process is inevitable, most older people have one or more chronic diseases. As a result, there is a high prevalence of somatic diseases, behavioral health problems, cognitive, and other functional limitations that impact the older population, not to mention geriatric syndromes such as falls and frailty. To fully address these challenges and improve the lives of older adults, the nursing community plays a key role in providing healthcare to this population.

THEORIES OF AGING

Psychosocial Theories

- A. Disengagement theory: Progressive social disengagement occurs naturally with aging and is accepted by the older adult. Variation in disengagement across older populations is related to cultural style and behaviors in different geographic regions.
- B. Activity theory: Successful aging requires a high level of activity and involvement to maintain life satisfaction and positive self-esteem.

Biologic Theories

- A. Pacemaker theory: A programmed decline or cessation of many components occurs in the nervous and endocrine systems.
- B. Immunity theory: A programmed accumulation of damage and decline of the immune system's function (immunosenescence) takes place due to oxidative stress.
- C. Wear-and-tear theory: After repeated use, damaged cells in the body structures wear out from the harmful effects of internal and external stressors, now known as free radicals.

HESI HINT The concept of aging is shifting from viewing older adults as frail and dependent to being able to engage in healthy living. Clinical judgment to differentiate the majority of those aged 65 and older regard their health as good or excellent. The clinical judgment model differentiates the ability of an older person to perform activities of daily living (ADLs) is a more accurate measure of an older person's age than chronological age.

Developmental Theories

- A. Erik Erikson's theory: Theory identifies eight stages of developmental tasks throughout the life span; the eighth stage is integrity versus despair.
- B. Maslow's theory: Maslow's hierarchy of needs ranks an individual's needs from the most basic to the most complex. Maslow uses the terms physiologic, safety and security, belonging, self-esteem, and self-actualization needs to describe the process that generally motivates individuals to move through life.

Physiologic Changes

- A. Aging affects every cell in every organ of the body, but not at the same rate.
- B. Three physiologic changes are clinically significant in making older adults vulnerable to injury and disease.
 1. Loss in compensatory reserve
 2. Progressive loss in the efficiency of the body to repair damaged tissue
 3. Decreased functioning of the immune system processes
- C. Diseases in older adults do not always present with classic signs and symptoms.
- D. Physiologic changes increase more rapidly with increasing age.
- E. Aging changes are influenced by genetic makeup and environment.

COMMUNICATION

HESI HINT Clinical judgment measures may include the development of preventive care such as exercise, teaching about good nutrition, and rehabilitation programs for the older adult. Keep in mind that the type of prevention programs should be tailored to the age of the person as well as diagnosis of the chronic disease.
