INTRODUCTION

"Pragmalinguistics" has been establishing a solid position in contemporary linguistics due to the extensive research being conducted. In the 20th century, linguistic analysis directions emerged, integrating philosophical ideas such as empiricism, phenomenology, and constructivism. Pragmalinguistics is certainly one of these directions. Nowadays, a number of research works based on linguopragmatic analysis have been carried out in Uzbek linguistics. Studying the pragmalinguistic nature of linguistic units is one of the important issues in linguistics. "Pragmatics is considered a relatively new field, where the relationship of language to its users is studied. In the communication process, the speaker has a specific purpose in expressing their thoughts. This The purpose of communication is to be understood by the listener. The more universal and obligatory the language is for the speaker and listener, the more universal and obligatory the speech is for them, and it is also social."

One of the linguistic phenomena studied based on pragmalinguistic analysis is presupposition. The concept of presupposition first appeared in philosophy, introduced into scientific practice by G. Frege, and later entered linguistics, where it has been and continues to be studied by scholars like Ch. Fillmore, A. Searle, G. Gazdar, J. Lakoff, N. Chomsky, among others.

"For proper and real implementation of speech communication, communicants must be familiar with certain facts before the moment of speech and must possess specific knowledge related to the general situation. These facts and knowledge are generalized in linguistics under the name of presupposition."

One of the main tasks of pragmatics is to study propositions related to the subject's internal purpose and the presuppositions expressed in them. For example, Dodho got up to open one side of the window for his own comfort rather than for his wives. The breeze that entered fluttered the hanging lamp. Dodho looked down and seemed pleased, saying: "It is indeed a flag!" and then he closed the window tightly and sat back down. (A. Qahhor. Terror). The simile "seemed
