“It’s Complicated” — Love in the Seventh Dimension and Other Geometric Romances

Ian F.V.G. Hunter^a

Abstract: o//o “blushes”. In this paper I gaslight myself into believe that my senpai loving another classmate is a good thing. Specific: Love Triangles are so 1990s. TV, trashy romance novels and other media need to get with the times and give us more complex romantic relationships. This paper presents novel romance stories for visualizations of such relationships until I don’t know how to anymore. We propose that the only good love stories are incomprehensible love stories.

“You have more respect for the difficulties of triangular geometry than I, old mathematics, have.” — Einstein, when asked about a potential love triangle forming in his personal life. (Isaacson, 2007)

What is Love?: Introduction

A love triangle, or an “eternal triangle” is a situation in which one person is loved by two others (Figure 1), usually romantically. The desired person in question often has a hard time choosing between the two potential love interests.

Figure 1: A love triangle between the main characters of the hit novel Twilight (Meyer, 2006). #TeamEdward

This is not to be confused with a thuple or a ménage à trois where there is a stable, established relationship between three persons. Specifically, it is an unresolved state which creates tension and drama in a TV series. Another form is a love “cycle” in which each member has unrequited love as shown in Figure 2. More complex interactions can be displayed as a “love web”. These often exist in long-running TV series where the writers are running out of ideas.

Baby Don’t Hurt Me: Geometry

As mentioned earlier, adding more people to a love triangle creates a web which is still two-dimensional. To reach a new love dimension, and to create a love pyramid, a new aspect of love must be considered. In traditional love triangles, the focus is typically on romantic love. Having a common contact that shares another type of love with the principal characters introduces another layer of depth to the story.

A guardian, therapist, confidant, or other associate is a mediator between characters, but also introduces their own motives, desires and problems into the geometric space leading to a deeper, less predictable story. In Figure 3, we see each character in the love triangle of the Naruto show is led by their teacher Kakashi, who wishes to protect them and for each of them to be the best person they can be.

Don’t Hurt Me: Geometry. But More Painful

In media, the fourth wall is usually referred to as the invisible barrier between the players on the stage and the audience. Normally confined to the three dimensions of the stage, “breaking the fourth wall” sees players interact with the audience, giving a new perspective to the piece. Similarly, if we consider this in relation to love triangles, one can understand that the fourth dimension must be the love that the audience has for the show and their characters. There are many unofficial love pyramids, as evidenced by the multitude of fan fictions and parasocial writings surrounding popular works (for a germane example, readers should consider the ultimate Harry Potter fanfic ‘My Immortal’).

For simplicity, and because My Immortal makes no god-damn sense, we have selected a different example of this four-dimensional love geometry – a love hyperpyramid – in Figure 4. To continue increasing the dimensions of love, a skilled writer should attempt to create love triangles not only between their written characters, but also between members of the audience.
