

Many years later, populations of Saw-wort were observed to increase rather than decrease following controlled burning at the Pian Brogione site in the common lands of Casanova (Val Trebbia, western Apennines). This was an unexpected result of an experiment that had been undertaken to increase the biodiversity of the heathland SIC (Cevasco et al. 2015; Cevasco and Moreno 2015). Oliver's 1984 observation on the Crevari mountains associated with the detail found in the Casanova mountains led us to look for other traces of this forgotten plant. On a European scale, the distribution of Saw-wort appears anomalous and relict. It can only be understood by going down to the topographic scale of an individual site and to its particular ecology considered as a historical product. This has already been noticed in Liguria for Round-Leafed Birthwort Aristolochia rotunda and Lily of the Valley Convallaria majalis, whose respective distributions are not linked to climatic or geological factors but to local land-management practices (Cevasco 2007; Bruzzone 2015).

Observational and sedimentary sources produced for the Pian Brogione site and the wider Trebbia-Aveto watershed area highlight several interesting issues:

1. The increase in the population of Saw-wort after the controlled fire experiment for the 2010 SIC project.
2. The pollen and anthracological (charcoals) diagram produced by paleobotanists (Menozzi and Montanari 2010; Cevasco 2018) shows a (relative) peak of Asteraceae, to which belongs Saw-wort, datable to the sixteenth century. The peak follows the greatest episode of fire recorded by the diagram starting from the twelfth century (to be precise, the quantity of microcarbons is equal to that recorded in the twelfth century when the fire precedes the planting of chestnut trees).
3. In the mid-sixteenth century, when the seigneurial jurisdiction changed from the Fieschi to the Doria family, the ancient mule track known as the Strada del Cifalco running along the watershed Trebbia-Aveto just above Pian Brogione was chosen by Tuscan muleteers as their preferred route to save time and taxes on the journey to France.
4. The pollen from Common Sainfoin Onobrychis vicifolia – a forage plant known in Val d'Aveto as lupinella, introduced in France in the fifteenth century and 'adopted' in Val d'Aveto only in the second half of the nineteenth century – has been documented in traces in the pollen diagram of Lake Rezzo (upper Val d'Aveto) around the sixteenth century. It appears that it had been tried out as a forage plant much earlier than was previously thought.

These are four small clues indicating that in the sixteenth century the routes of muleteers and merchants between Tuscany and France left sedimentary and documentary traces in the Trebbia-Aveto area (Tigrino 2007). Moreover, the intersection of the data on the increase in Saw-wort at Pian Brogione following the controlled fire and the pollen and anthracological diagram shows that Saw-wort is favoured by controlled fire practices and is an indicator of these practices.

If we remove the historical context from observation, Saw-wort is not a particularly useful plant to characterize a specific ecological area, because it is found in variable habitats (from woods to flooded meadows) and with strong differences in pH. However, if we adopt the micro-view of historical ecology, the same plant can take on the value of an 'indicator species'. This might be, for instance, as an indicator of fire as at Pian Brogione, or of a woodland margin, as Oliver noted at Monte Tardia. It may also be an indicator of historical gathering and collection activities. In nearby northern Tuscany, for example the practice of 'making Cerretta in Cerbaia', the practice of collecting Saw-wort (called Serretta or Cerretta) to make a yellow dye for woollen cloth, is recorded in the Cerbaie Hills from the second half of the fourteenth century up to the mid-sixteenth century (Piussi and Stiavelli 1995; Zagli 2004; Malvolti 2014). The plant grew in common lands, including wetlands and wooded pastures of
