Shigeru Yasukuni, who sponsored a series of meetings about 20 years before Yasukuni's death, was a prominent, conservative politician and naval officer. He is also remembered for building over 2,000 shrines for gods, some Shinto and others from other religions, all in Japan's name. One way that you can understand his feelings, and how they spread after Yasukuni's death, is by looking at his family. Yasukuni was the son of a samurai, and his family was usually considered part of the samurai, or noble, tradition, although they were not, as you know, Shinto. But still, he had a good sense of the Shinto religion, and considered all great Shinto shrines. And Yasukuni's shrine was one of those great Shinto shrines. Others, in a way, followed his example.

Continuing, I observed how people within the community all seemed to have some business or other interest in the area and seemed to be working together. However, I began to have some doubts as to whether such unity really existed. When I asked about the local council, I was told that they had recently been elected and that the council was still in the process of setting up. I was told that the council was still in the process of setting up and that the council was still in the process of setting up.
