

Non-Emergent Endotracheal Intubation of the Newborn: Practical Management

KEY FACTS:

1. Neonatal endotracheal intubation is a distressful, painful, and potentially dangerous procedure^{1,2}.
2. The routine use of adequate analgesia before planned painful procedures in the newborn, including endotracheal intubation, is required on humane and ethical basis. Furthermore, awake intubation is associated with more complications than premedicated intubation³.
3. Premedication for non-urgent or semi-urgent intubations is safer and more effective than awake intubations³. It is well known that the complications of neonatal intubation are increased with emergent intubations, multiple attempts, physiological instability, or ventilation failure; and decreased with use of paralytic medications and videolaryngoscopy⁴.
4. The reported adverse physiological disturbances during awake neonatal intubation include hypoxemia, vagally induced bradycardia and systemic, pulmonary, and intracranial hypertension⁴.
5. The use of premedication for nonemergent neonatal intubation:
 - A. Attenuates or abolishes some complications associated with awake intubation⁵.
 - B. Reduces pain and discomfort⁶.
 - C. Improves the success rate of intubation⁷.
 - D. Decreases the duration of the intubation procedure⁸.
6. The use of standardised premedication protocol for non-emergent neonatal tracheal intubations improves compliance and patient outcomes⁹.

Practical Management of Non-Emergent Endotracheal Intubation:

- A. Non-emergent endotracheal intubation is defined as the planned endotracheal intubation to provide respiratory support, in the absence of an immediate need for resuscitation or a life-threatening situation.
- B. Intubation without the use of premedication should only be considered if advanced airway is required immediately following birth or in emergency life-threatening situations within NICU when an intravenous access or the medications are not immediately available.
- C. The situations for non-emergent endotracheal intubation include but not limited to:
 1. Anticipated need of escalation of respiratory support in babies on no support or on non-invasive ventilation.
 2. Elective mechanical ventilation before planned surgery, transport, or procedures.
 3. Requirement for ETT tube change due to partial blockage, excessive leak, infection etc.
 4. Elective intubation for airway protection or maintenance. (e.g., Decreased level of consciousness, upper airway malformations, etc.)
- D. The necessary equipment's and medications for non-emergent endotracheal intubation must be ready by the baby incubator/resuscitator side before the baby is positioned for the intubation. See Table 1 for the required preparation, Table 2 for the medication doses and Table 3 for preparation of the medications.
- E. The nurse assigned to the baby should carry a Time-Out check using the checklist as in Table 4 just before positioning the baby for the procedure. Table 4 may be used for Audit purposes.
- F. The operator may prefer not to have many audiences during the procedure including parents. This should be requested calmly and politely before the baby is positioned for the intubation. It is often very traumatic for the parents to see their baby during stressful times. The success rate of first time intubation increases if the intubation operators are not feeling "under pressure".
- G. The intubation performer (Or the supervisor) should agree with the team a concise and clear plan of the intubation steps, length and conditions of any intubation attempt, the number of attempts and the alternative plan if intubation is not successful.
- H. The Neonatal unit should audit the outcome of premedicated intubations vs awake intubation.
