LANDSCAPE MANAGEMENT FOR A LANDSCAPE SPECIES Emma Suzuki Spence,2017 Greater Sage grouse Centrocercus urophasianus are both an umbrella and flagship species for conservation concern throughout the intermountain west For the past fifty years sage grouse populations have been experiencing a range wide decline Long term declines in sage grouse abundance have prompted eight listing attempts for the species under provisions of the Endangered Species Act ESA Proximate causes of population decline s differ across sage grouse distribution but ultimately the underlying cause is loss or degradation of suitable sagebrush land cover Wyoming is arguably the most important region for sage grouse management because Wyoming is not only at the center of sage grouse distribution but also hosts the largest sage grouse population of any state in the species 11 US State 3 Canadian Province range In 2008 then Governor Dave Freudenthal signed an executive order that enacted the Greater Sage grouse Core Area Protection that set aside 31 distinct regions called Core Areas which collectively encompass 24% of the total area of Wyoming State of Wyoming 2008 Upon establishment these Core Areas contained 82% of the male sage grouse in Wyoming at that time State of Wyoming 2008 State of Wyoming 2010 However since establishment the Core Areas established by the SGEO have been redrawn or modified 4 times For my research I investigated the overall effectiveness of the Core Areas as established by the SGEO in Wyoming in light of anthropogenic impacts Using the Wyoming Game and Fish Department s WGFD sage grouse lek database to characterize sage grouse populations across Wyoming along with other publically available data sets we found that the Core Areas contained 64% of all active leks and accounted for 77% of male sage grouse attending leks Furthermore we found that Core Areas had a higher average lek attendance average males core lek 22.776 average males non core lek 9.225 t test df 1821 P Atlantic Rim Natural Gas Field Development Project ,2006
