Turner,2015 With its powerful mandate to unify patent law the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit CAFC established in 1982 represents an intriguing recent example of an institutional innovation with potentially broad economic consequences Given sole responsibility for handling patent appeals and widely regarded as pro patent the CAFC has indeed produced a new body of patent law Unfortunately research has yet to identify and explain accurately its impact on patent litigation patenting and inventive activity Given that both the amount of patent litigation and the number of patents have grown substantially during the last twenty years the time is ripe to address this directly We present and analyze a novel data set spanning 1953 2002 that reflects more than 6 000 decisions published in the United States Patents Quarterly USPQ Specifically we 1 compare directly the tendencies of the CAFC to those of its predecessor appeals courts 2 consider separately the issues of validity and infringement and 3 examine how appeals court tendencies affect the actions of lower courts and or litigants We find that the CAFC has been significantly more reluctant to affirm patents invalid than its predecessors but has not been more reluctant to affirm patents not infringed As a result district courts have decided patents invalid significantly less often patentees have appealed invalid decisions significantly more often and the infringement inquiry has grown in importance      Patents and the Federal Circuit Robert Harmon,2000-07      Federal Circuit Annual Review ,2004      Patent Claim Construction Robert C. Over the last twenty years a quiet revolution has taken place in patent law Before 1982 courts rigorously enforced the nonobviousness requirement limiting patents to those innovations representing a substantial technical advance At the same time once an innovation satisfied this rigorous standard courts accorded the patent a broad scope by applying a vibrant doctrine of equivalents Since 1982 the Federal Circuit with the acquiescence and sometimes the consent of the Court has rewritten both doctrines sharply limiting their reach Through their doctrinal changes we have moved over the last twenty years from patents that were rarely valid but if valid broadly enforced to patents that are routinely valid but narrowly enforced In order to evaluate whether this switch is likely to Promote the Progress of the useful Arts this article explores the economics of patents and identifies the uniformity of patent protection as a key to understanding the structure of patent law Both patent and copyright protect a wide range of innovative products Some of these innovative products require very little protection to ensure their development and disclosure while others require considerably more If we had perfect information then in the absence of agency and transaction costs an optimal patent system would individually tailor protection to each innovative product providing protection just sufficient to ensure each desirable innovation's development and disclosure Historically however the practice of both patent and copyright has been to provide more or less uniform protection to all information products that satisfy a given set of prerequisites Although this uniformity is a potentially rational response to the presence of information agency and transaction costs the fact of uniformity creates a trade off in expanding patent protection between i the social value of the additional information products broader protection ensures and ii the reduced social value associated with the preexisting information products protected more broadly than necessary to secure their discovery and disclosure Measured against the costs of uniformity the switch to routinely valid but narrowly enforced patents has two principal consequences First effectively eliminating the nonobviousness requirement will extend patent protection to a wider range of innovative products that would have been forthcoming with no or less protection Given the trade off uniformity entails protecting a wider range of preexisting innovations increases the cost of any given expansion in protection and thereby drags down the optimal level of uniform protection Eliminating the nonobviousness requirement thus limits the patent system's ability to encourage desirable but more costly innovation Second at the same time the switch removes from the patent system two of the principal doctrines by which courts could attempt to vary the effective level of protection provided to particular innovations By reducing the ability of courts to tailor protection to the individually optimal the switch to routinely valid but narrowly enforced patents pushes us towards a more uniform one size fits all system of patent protection As with the first consequence reducing the legal system's ability to tailor protection to the individually optimal level will limit the patent system's ability to encourage desirable but more costly innovation As a result the switch to routinely valid but narrowly enforced patents will limit the range of desirable innovations that the patent system can ensure
