

Your brain and nerves

A brain is a lot of nerve cells linked to other nerves throughout the body. A jellyfish has a nerve network but no actual brain.

Your brain is one of the most important organs in your body. It acts as a control centre that directs all the other parts, allowing you to move, solve problems, remember and feel. The brain is linked to the rest of the body through a network of nerves. The brain and all the nerves together form the nervous system. Animals such as dolphins (right) also have a well-developed nervous system.

Brain and nerves

Systems of the body

Body systems are the body's main working units. They help each other to work. The circulatory system supplies the brain with oxygen from the respiratory (breathing) system and nourishment from the digestive system.

Digestion Circulation Muscles Bones and joints

The nervous system

The spinal cord runs down inside your backbone. It is a bundle of nerves that connects your brain to different parts of your body. The brain and spinal cord form the central nervous system. You also have a network of smaller nerves that run throughout your body.

Co-ordinating senses and movement

Information from your senses, such as the sight of a moving ball, travels along nerves to your brain. In response, the brain may send signals via nerves to your muscles, so that you can catch the ball.

Conscious and unconscious

Your brain takes care of unconscious processes like breathing and digestion without you even being aware of it. It also allows you to carry out all sorts of conscious processes such as working out problems, making decisions and having a good time!

What a nerve!

A network of nerves reaches every part of your body. The sciatic nerve is the thickest and longest nerve in the body. It is about 2 cm across when it leaves the spinal cord and its longest fibres reach all the way down to your toes.
