Nations National Guard

United States. Congress. House.
Committee on Armed Services

Nations National Guard:

The Nation's National Guard National Guard Association of the United States, Ellard A. Walsh, 1954      Operationalizing the Army National Guard Jesse J. Kirchmeier, Us Army National Guard Major Kirchmeier, School of Advanced Military Studies, 2012-09-16

The Army announced in the 2006 Army Posture Statement that it had to operationalize the Army National Guard. The decision to operationalize the National Guard was necessary because the Army did not have enough active units to meet requirements for the War on Terrorism. Operationalization of the Army National Guard was a departure from the Cold War force structure. It was not however a revolutionary change for the nation's National Guard forces. The research initially focused on determining what was meant by the term strategic reserve. That research revealed that numerous military commanders both active and reserve have used the term in reference to U S Army force structure. However military policy documents and statutes do not define that term. The search for a clear definition of strategic reserve and its meaning for U S National Guard structure led to the discovery that the National Guard had only recently been constituted as a strategic reserve. The National Guard did not begin as a strategic reserve. The Guard also has experience as an operational force. The view that the National Guard was only a strategic reserve developed during the Cold War. After the end of the draft the Department of Defense implemented the Total Force Policy. That policy started the National Guard's movement back toward operational capability. The research explores the history of the National Guard as the nation's constitutional defense force and its subsequent development into a Federal Reserve. The history reveals that operationalization of the National Guard is not a radical venture for state controlled units. Rather the Army's use of the National Guard as an operational force is a return to the tradition of state militias participating in the nation's defense. The National Guard serving in an operational role is not unique in the nation's history. The Cold War practice of maintaining separate strategic and operational reserve forces does not meet today's force demands. Security planners have yet to refine post Cold War force and mission definitions. Until the missions are redefined it was only natural for the Army to use its reserves to reduce stress on active component forces. It is also a mistake to assume the Army suddenly made the reserves operational or that the National Guard has never served in an operational manner. While at times the Army resisted using the Guard the Guard has a history of serving in an operational role. The Constitution specified that state based militias would serve as part of the country's main defense force. Operationalization of the National Guard is an extension of the policies Congress started under the National Militia Act of 1903. The Army is only continuing these practices with its 2006 Army Posture Statement announcement. Finally the United States has historically been unprepared for major long term conflicts. The nation also tends to decrease active component strength following hostilities. These precedents foretell the same once significant combat operations in Iraq and Afghanistan end. As such equipping and training the National Guard for operational force capability potentially enhances its ability to perform both strategic and operational force functions in the future.      The National Guard United States.
