Bibek Adhikari, Mr. Romain A Duval, Bingjie Hu, Mr. Prakash Loungani, 2016-08-09 A number of advanced economies carried out a sequence of extensive reforms of their labor and product markets in the 1990s and early 2000s Using the Synthetic Control Method SCM this paper implements six case studies of well known waves of reforms those of New Zealand Australia Denmark Ireland and Netherlands in the 1990s and the labor market reforms in Germany in the early 2000s In four of the six cases GDP per capita was higher than in the control group as a result of the reforms No difference between the treated country and its synthetic counterpart could be found in the cases of Denmark and New Zealand which in the latter case may have partly reflected the implementation of reforms under particularly weak macroeconomic conditions Overall also factoring in the limitations of the SCM in this context the results are suggestive of a positive but heterogeneous effect of reform waves on GDP per capita
