

THE NATIONAL QUESTION (continued from page 1)

The question that arises in connection with nationalism is not whether it is a good or bad thing, but whether it is a necessary and just thing. The answer to this question is not simple, for nationalism is a complex phenomenon that has many different meanings and implications. In some cases, nationalism is a force for good, promoting the unity and strength of a nation. In other cases, it is a force for evil, leading to the oppression and destruction of other nations. The question of nationalism is therefore a question of the balance between the good and the evil that it can produce.

The question of nationalism is also a question of the balance between the individual and the nation. On the one hand, the individual has the right to self-determination and to the pursuit of happiness. On the other hand, the nation has the right to self-determination and to the pursuit of happiness. The question of nationalism is therefore a question of the balance between the individual and the nation, and of the balance between the good and the evil that nationalism can produce.

The question of nationalism is also a question of the balance between the past and the future. On the one hand, the past is a source of pride and inspiration. On the other hand, the past is also a source of oppression and destruction. The question of nationalism is therefore a question of the balance between the past and the future, and of the balance between the good and the evil that nationalism can produce.

The question of nationalism is also a question of the balance between the present and the future. On the one hand, the present is a source of pride and inspiration. On the other hand, the present is also a source of oppression and destruction. The question of nationalism is therefore a question of the balance between the present and the future, and of the balance between the good and the evil that nationalism can produce.
