Researching Contemporary Paganism: an interview with professor of comparative religion Sarah M. Pike Pesquisando paganismo contemporâneo: uma entrevista com a professora de religiões comparadas Sarah M. Pike

*Celso Luiz Terzetti Filho

One of the most prominent researcher in Contemporary Paganism in North America is Sarah M. Pike, professor of comparative religion and Director of Humanities Center of California State University in Chico. She is author of two important studies on this subject: Earthly Bodies, Magical Selves: Contemporary Pagans and The Search for Community (University of California Press, 2001); New Age and Neopagan Religions in America (Columbia University Press, 2004). Both works considered seminar ethnographic studies in the Pagan Studies field, being the first, the result of five-year ethnographic study of Pagan festival participants.

With the increasingly research on contemporary pagan groups in Brazil, become clearer the necessity to dialogue with scholars with a more accurate acquaintance and experience on this subject. In this sense, this interview with Professor Pike aims to present her main ideas for Brazilian researches interested in Contemporary Paganism.

1. Could you tell us how did you become interested on New Religious Movement, specifically Contemporary Paganism?

When I was in graduate school in the U.S. in the late 1980s and early 1990s, there was widespread misunderstanding of new religious movements that led to disasters like Waco in 1993 when an entire community of Branch Davidians was killed by American law enforcement agencies. While the Davidians were Christians, demonization of other groups, including contemporary Pagans, was common then. I was drawn to the study of new religions because it seemed urgently important to try to increase public understanding of religions considered strange or unfamiliar, especially in the news media and law enforcement. At the same time, I met some
