

Treatment of Multiple Personality Disorder: A Survey of Current Practices

Frank W. Putnam, M.D., and Richard J. Loewenstein, M.D.

Objective: Reported cases of multiple personality disorder have increased dramatically in the last decade. Few data are available on the treatment of multiple personality disorder. Current recommendations are based on the experience of individual clinicians rather than on systematic research. Method: A questionnaire study of 305 clinicians representing a spectrum of mental health professionals was conducted to survey the types and relative efficacy of treatment modalities currently used with cases of multiple personality disorder. Results: Individual psychotherapy facilitated by hypnosis was uniformly endorsed as the primary treatment by all practitioner groups. The average patient was in twice-weekly psychotherapy facilitated by hypnosis for 3.8 years. Antidepressant and anxiolytic medications were reported to be moderately useful adjunctive treatments. Conclusions: These findings support current impressionistic treatment recommendations for multiple personality disorder regarding the primacy of psychotherapy and the moderate benefits of psychopharmacology with antidepressant and anti-anxiety agents.

(Am J Psychiatry 1993; 150:1048-1052)

Recently, there has been a marked increase in the literature of subjects diagnosed with dissociative disorders, particularly multiple personality disorder (1-6). This increase in reported cases results primarily from a reformulation of multiple personality disorder as a chronic form of childhood-onset posttraumatic dissociative disorder. Further, the advent of reliable and valid screening and diagnostic instruments for dissociation and multiple personality disorder has led to identification of cases with greater precision, particularly in populations in which dissociative pathologies might otherwise be overlooked (7-9).

The clinical literature describes a treatment paradigm for multiple personality disorder that uses intensive psychodynamic psychotherapy facilitated by hypnotherapy as the major therapeutic intervention for these patients (10-13). Adjunctive pharmacotherapy, primarily for anxiety, affective, and posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) symptoms, has been advocated as well, mainly with antidepressants and benzodiazepines (13-15). Efficacy has also been reported for a variety of other ancillary treatment methods such as expressive therapies (16), homogeneous (i.e., all multiple personality disorder) group therapy (17), behavioral modification (18), and family therapy (primarily with the contemporary family of the patient, not with the family of origin) (19).

However, there have been few systematic studies of treatment outcome for multiple personality disorder. Kluft (20, 21) has reported favorable results using "supportive-expressive" psychotherapy facilitated by hypnotherapy in his large personal case series of several hundred patients. Coons (11) reported favorable outcome in 15 of 20 patients with multiple personality disorder treated with psychotherapy and adjunctive hypnotherapy.

The purpose of this study was to collect data on treatment setting and modalities of treatment among clinicians working with patients with multiple personality disorder. We gathered data from a cross-section of therapists representing different mental health disciplines (psychiatry, psychology, social work, psychiatric nursing, and other mental health practitioners) in order to investigate current treatment practices for this population. We hypothesized that the clinical nature of multiple personality disorder would force common treatment strategies regardless of professional orientation. It was also hypothesized that the mean length of treatment for the cohort would reflect a more chronic disorder than has been conveyed by current impressionistic reports.

METHOD

Data were gathered by a questionnaire mailed to therapists. Each therapist was asked to contribute only a single, representative case from his or her practice. No identifying information was collected on the patient. The mailing list was compiled from the professional mem-
