Pathogenic Advances and Therapeutic Perspectives for Eosinophilic Inflammation Florence E. Roufosse, Mats W. Johansson, 2018-12-06 With the recent approval of the first eosinophil depleting therapeutic agents targeting the IL 5 pathway for treatment of severe eosinophilic asthma eosinophils and eosinophilic disorders are in the limelight Indeed setbacks during clinical development of these compounds have revealed how much remains to be known about eosinophil biology in vivo and have nurtured profuse research both on basic eosinophil biology and on pathogenic disease mechanisms in order to better delineate the most meaningful targets for innovative therapeutic strategies On one hand variable degrees of eosinophil depletion observed in some compartments during IL 5 targeted treatment indicate that certain eosinophil subsets may not rely on this cytokine and or that other important pro eosinophilic mediators and signaling pathways are operative in vivo On the other hand it is increasingly clear that disorders involving eosinophils such as asthma are the final outcome of complex interactions between diverse cell types and mediators beyond eosinophils and IL 5 These include type 2 helper T Th2 cells and innate lymphoid cells mast cells and a variety of factors that either activate eosinophils or are released by them Although a considerable amount of research has focused on asthma because it is a common condition and because management of severe asthma remains a major challenge several rare eosinophilic disorders with more homogenous features have proven to be extremely useful models to reach a better understanding of the involvement of eosinophils in tissue damage and dysfunction and of the micro environmental interactions operating within the complex network of eosinophilic inflammation Unraveling this interplay has resulted in advances in the development of molecular tools to detect disease subsets and to monitor therapeutic responses and in identification of promising new therapeutic
