

A fast 1/1000sec shutter speed freezes the action

Shutter speeds and movement

A slow 1/15sec blurs the background as the camera is panned to follow the subject

FAST shutter speeds freeze action. Slow speeds blur action. Used carelessly, the wrong shutter speed can ruin a picture that shows movement. Used creatively, blur can add atmosphere. Shutter speeds also compensate for camera shake when using a film camera without image stabilisation. The longer the lens, the faster the speed needed for a handheld camera. Generally use as a minimum shutter speed the one closest to the reciprocal of the focal length of the lens: a 50mm lens requires 1/50sec (or nearest 1/60sec equivalent), a 250mm lens requires 1/250sec, etc.

Lens apertures

The aperture control is usually found on a ring around the lens barrel. The aperture comprises a circular iris that can be opened wide or closed down to a small gap to control the amount of light allowed through the lens. Apertures are designated in f-stops – the result of dividing the diameter of the aperture into the focal length of the lens. The higher the number, the smaller the aperture.

Shutter speeds

Shutter speeds are often found on a dial, usually on the top of a 35mm camera, more often on the side of a roll film camera, and sometimes on a ring around the lens on either. The dial or ring controls either an iris that opens and closes behind the lens or, most usually in a single lens reflex (SLR), two blinds that follow each other across the focal plane in front of the film. In this way they manage the time that light is allowed through the lens. They are designated in fractions of a second. The smaller the fraction, the faster the speed.

Exposure

The earliest cameras with built-in exposure meters were around as early as the mid-1930s, so let's allow ourselves a meter on our otherwise manual film camera. The meter measures the intensity of the light falling on the subject and translates that into a suggested exposure setting.

It doesn't matter how many exposure modes a modern camera has, they mostly boil down to the use of apertures and shutter speeds. Each setting on the aperture or shutter speed scale is half or double its neighbour. So it's possible to set a whole range of different combinations which, in effect, give the same exposure for the light.

For example, 1/125sec at f/11 gives the same exposure as 1/250sec at f/8, because as the shutter speed was halved, the amount of light through the aperture was doubled. Likewise, that same with the pictorial arts this pioneering study explores how cinema s emergence was grounded in theories of picture composition craft and arts education from magic lantern experiments in 1890s New York through to early Hollywood feature films in the 1920s Challenging received notions that the advent of cinema was a celebration of mechanisation and a radical rejection of nineteenth century traditions of representation Kaveh Askari instead emphasises the overlap between craft traditions and modernity in early film Opening up valuable new perspectives on the history of film as art Askari links

American silent cinema with the practice of teaching the public how to appreciate fine art charts its entrance into arts
