

New Forms of Work Organization and Employee Involvement in Two Case Study Sites: Plural, Mixed and Protean

John F. Geary

University of Warwick

This article critically examines the introduction of new forms of work organization and employee involvement in two American electronics companies operating in the Republic of Ireland. The success of these initiatives was found to be intimately related to three factors: management commitment, workers' response and operational pressures. It was found that a number of different forms of labour regulation existed side-by-side within the same organization. This paper tries to account for the persistence of these 'older' forms of labour regulation. In addition, it is argued that workers remain suspicious of, and removed from, management.

Introduction

At present the industrial relations landscape would seem to be marked with little else but untenable positions, places fit only to retreat from. And this is true of both trade unions and employers. Management has endeavoured to dispense with an adversarial approach to employee relations and instead adopt more consensual forms of labour regulation. The 'old' unionism has had to concede that the ground it once occupied is moving fast from under its feet. Commentators speak of the need for or, indeed, the existence of, a new industrial relations, a movement from compliance to consent, the adoption of human resource management techniques and a new realism among trade unions (for example Bassett, 1986). In this varied literature new economic pressures are ascribed a talismanic presence. The new industrial relations (NIR) and human resource management (HRM) bespeak of a renewed effort and concern among employers to survive in the face of an austere economic environment.

New Forms of Work Organization in Europe Peter Grootings, Bjørn Gustavsen, Lajos Hächthy, A remarkable development in the sociology of work in recent years has been the explosion of brilliant cross national and cross cultural studies in Europe examining the conditions of labor against the background of different economic systems and differences within each of the major free market mixed welfare and planned economic systems that dot the European landscape In Vienna and Budapest in particular a group of intellectual workers have gotten together for what can only be described as breakthrough studies in the conditions and purposes of work in post industrial society The question of new forms of work organization focuses on job satisfaction participatory democracy in the work place levels of productivity and issues of health and safety in the occupational environment That these elements are important have long been known But what this collection of studies emphasizes is the specific mix that produced specific outcomes It does not shy away from dangerous and tough questions worker control and control of workers political participation in contexts of authoritarian regimes and personal rewards in contexts that once frowned upon private acquisition of capital The volume is rich in empirical studies and draws the theoretical implications that can and already have had vast policy consequences for workers in the modern context Issues relating to job rotation enrichment enlargement and autonomy and others related to new forms of organization starting with the shop floor and extending throughout the management of the enterprise as a whole are dealt with candidly The social character of labor long frowned upon as a mechanism for evading bread and butter issues is now recognized East and West as a dimension of concern that is growing precisely as the size and character of the labor sector is diminishing This is must reading for those interested in new forms of social and policy synthesis and ways of meliorating competing claims of different sectors in modern societies
