

The Lymphatic System

Lymph and lymph vessels

Lymph is a clear fluid that contains white blood cells and other substances. It is found in the lymphatic system, which is a network of vessels and organs that help to fight infection and disease. Lymph is produced in the bone marrow and travels through the lymphatic system to the bloodstream. It is then returned to the bloodstream and circulates throughout the body.

Lymph nodes

Lymph nodes are small, bean-shaped organs that are part of the lymphatic system. They are located throughout the body, often in clusters. Lymph nodes filter lymph and remove any harmful substances, such as bacteria and viruses. They also produce and store white blood cells, which are important for fighting infection.

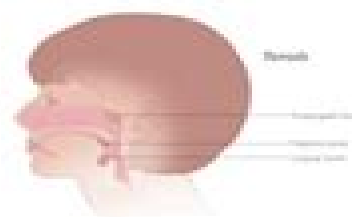

Inflammatory and immune responses

The lymphatic system plays a key role in the body's inflammatory and immune responses. When there is an infection or injury, the lymphatic system helps to transport white blood cells to the site of the problem. These cells then work to fight the infection and heal the wound. The lymphatic system also helps to remove any harmful substances from the body, such as toxins and waste products.

Formation of lymphocytes

Lymphocytes are a type of white blood cell that are important for the immune system. They are formed in the bone marrow and travel through the lymphatic system. Lymphocytes help to fight infection and disease by attacking and destroying harmful substances. They also help to regulate the immune system and prevent it from overreacting to harmless substances.
