

clinical findings have been remarkably similar in man, mink, and cattle.⁶ Experimental studies have been more extensive in mink and cattle than in man. Where correlations among the three species are possible, the results are generally in agreement. The major differences that have been reported could usually be related to secondary diseases or to chemotherapeutic agents used to treat the diseases in affected members of all three species. In addition, there is the problem of species specificity of an agent; for example, Aleutian disease does not occur in cattle or man, only in mink, and the generalized infiltrate in man referred to earlier could easily be due to an agent that does not affect mink, cattle, or mice. This does not mean that the C-HS is different in the various species in which it has been observed; it does suggest, however, that, although four species have a similar genetic trait, this fact does not necessarily alter their responses to an agent that normally affects only one of them.

The last category in which comparisons between the species are clearly possible involves electron microscopy. The most extensive studies to date are those of Lutzner⁷ on mink and Doak⁸ on cattle. These studies are in agreement as to the distribution of abnormal intracytoplasmic organelles in the various cell types in affected members of both populations. Studies in man have been limited to the periph-
