

A RE-APPRAISAL OF DETERMINISTS' REPUDIATION OF MAN'S FREEWILL

IDORENYIN FRANCIS ESIKOT

Faculty of Arts Department of Philosophy University of Uyo, Nigeria

ABSTRACT: The idea of scientific determinism presupposes a regular pattern, an order that physical events follow by which prediction can be easily made. Popper calls it a "closed system" because of nature's rigidity. Man being a part of nature is enclosed in this "clock-work" system with its rigid rules and procedures. The dilemma that stares us in the face and which necessitated this work is how we can reconcile man's freewill especially in the area of morality with a universe that appears determinate; hence this paper is an attempt to present the determinist argument against freewill in order to ascertain its plausibility in the light of new development in science.

Keywords—Determinism, Freewill, Man, Re-Appraisal, Repudiation.

I. INTRODUCTION

Determinism and freewillism are parallel to each other with profound implications when followed strictly. This has propelled inquiries into the understanding of both positions even from antiquity. Man has always been held as having freedom of choice. This has given the idea of responsibility and punishment prominence in our legal system and has made civil society more meaningful.

The question of man's freewill suggests the idea of volition. This implies that man's action is not influenced by external or internal factors in anyway. It also means that man is rational who thinks and analyze his thought processes before he embarks on an action. We can further infer from the idea of man's freewill that he is a transcendental being who is independent from the influence of circumstances. Man's actions therefore, are not an afterthought but carefully planned and executed.

All these analysis notwithstanding, there are strong reasons to think contrary to man having freewill. The following lines by Newton as captured in Christian (2000) gives credence to this thinking: God at the beginning formed matter in solid, massy, hard, impenetrable, moveable particles and went on to conclude that all of nature is composed of atoms and forces that are either attractive or repulsive; chemical compounds can be explained as combinations of these atoms. He also recognized seemingly non-material processes such as light and heat. Mass and energy are conserved no matter what physical changes they undergo. The principle of cause and effect is a universal law, unbroken and non negotiable. Time and space exists as absolutes of nature (p. 508).

From the afore-quoted, it will be right to say that all the physical processes in nature have been "bracketed". Nothing happens without a cause. Thus it follows that even when a man thinks he is free by making a choice, his choice or purported freedom is influenced by factors that are outside of him in so far as he is a part of nature. In the century following Newton's discoveries, a new interpretation of the universe emerged and this was determinism. Pagels (1983) states that:

According to determinism, the universe may be viewed as a great clockwork set in motion by a divine hand at the beginning of time and then left undisturbed. From its largest to its smallest motions the entire material creation moves in a way that can be predicted with absolute accuracy; by the laws of Newton nothing is left to chance. The future is as precisely determined by the past as is the forward movement of a clock (p. 4). But one will wonder if with the advent of quantum theory which has upturned the concept of determinism and replaced it with indeterminacy, whether this position is still tenable. The question to be posed here is: can quantum mechanics create a space in which freewill can operate? That is an opening for freewill, not an explanation for freewill? Can the mind be reducible to matter? If the human freewill is closed up in the deterministic laws of physics, then human freewill will require one of two things: an exercise of human freewill would entail a violation of the laws of physics (the law of conservation of energy and momentum) or God foreseeing from eternity all our free choices, arranged the initial conditions of the physical universe so that what we choose to do is actually done by our bodies (a form of occasionalism). Both positions are awkward
