ABSTRACT:

In one of his freewheeling interviews with Indian Express, R Raj Rao – Professor English at SP University of Pune, renowned novelist and poet, and one of India's first gay academicians refused to call himself a gay writer. He argued that he prefers himself as a Queer Writer “because when you stay queer, you are destabilizing normativity. It is much better to destabilize normativity, as we know it, than become normative ourselves.” This paper analyses selected short stories from his book of short stories “One day I locked my flat in soul city” first published by Rupa in 1995 and then as a revised and enlarged edition by Harper Collins India as unique manifestations of this queer radical aestheticism founded on the precipice of desire and subversion. These short stories permit exploration of queer sensibilities that rebut the universal gay paradigm. Rather, they locate the characters within a very local and immediate context that is far removed from the western straitjacketing. These narratives explore alternative sexual relationships and the new morality values and rules instituted as a result. Unsurprisingly, the discourses yielded are far from conventional and stereotyped images of homosexual love in a culture that privileges heteronormativity.

Keywords: Queer, Transgression, Aesthetics, Identity, Heteronormativity, Gay, Inversion.

“To be or not to be – that is the question” the famous soliloquy in Hamlet suggests. Over the years, the quote has evolved into a shorthand for a dilemma, and hence choice. The quote is one good way to approach the question of writing when the author is strongly wedded to a political perspective, and derives identity from this political view. Must politics trump the aesthetic or the literariness of the text in order for the ‘political message’ to reach the reader, or must it be the other way round: prioritizing art, and politics relegated to sidelines. This is hardly a fresh question, as the dilemma is an old one: art for art's sake versus motivated art. Yet, the question remains unanswered as ever, as writers steeped in strong political ideas are often typecast and stereotyped that reflects in the myopic reading of their works. Works of such authors are often taken to be manifestations of their politics, and not analyzed on the basis of their literary merits – a privilege extended to their non-political counterparts.

Hence, when R Raj Rao – an avowedly gay academic pens a book of short stories, they are celebrated on account of the ‘gayness’ of the content, and a celebration of mainstreaming of gay voices. Such a celebration aims to delineate and understand the radical politics of the texts that completely resist any such pigeonholing and restriction to a single ideological trajectory.
