Situative (Brown, Collins, & Duguid, 1989; Greeno, 1997; Kirshner & Whitson, 1997; Lave & Wenger, 1991) and distributed (Pea, 1993; Salomon, 1993) theories of cognition increasingly are being proposed as alternatives to the traditional individualist notion offered by cognitive psychology. From this perspective, knowledge, perhaps more aptly termed knowing about, is no longer conceived of as a static structure residing in the individual's head; instead, knowing is a process distributed across the knower, the environment in which knowing occurs, and the activity in which the learner is participating. Thus, knowing and context are irreducibly co-constituted (Barab, Hay, Barnett, & Squire, in press; Greeno, 1998), and learning is (re)conceived as fundamentally constitutive of the contextual particulars in which it is nested (Cobb & Yackel, 1996; Lave, 1997). Environments developed to support such learning, what we are calling dynamical learning environments (DLEs), are not simply backdrops for supporting the transmission of content, but are considered dynamic arenas supporting trajectories of participation that are reciprocally constituted by and within context (Barab & Duffy, 2000; Cobb & Bowers, 1999). How one begins to account for learning and the potential of a learning context to support learning is the focus of this special issue.
