

A computer design system featuring modular architecture and local processing power permits natural interaction between the designer and the computer-based product model.

CAD/CAM Work Stations for Man-Model Communication

Frank M. Lillehaugen

Institute for Computer Aids of Norway

The work station is the most important part of any CAD/CAM system in industrial operation. Uniform operating procedures and easy access to archives, engineering data, and product models are key requirements of a work station in an integrated system. Environmental and ergonomic aspects are also of increasing importance for the general acceptance of this technology. A work station should take into account the various backgrounds and training of the people who will use it.¹

So far, however, most work stations employing interactive graphic displays have been designed to suit the available hardware features rather than the user's needs. The limited dynamics of storage tubes and raster displays inhibit interaction between the user and the computer—i.e., man-machine communication. The effectiveness and ease of man-machine communication depend on the kinds of accommodations that a computing system accords the user. Appropriate channels, devices, protocols, and controlling parameters are needed for communication in either direction.

But the real aim in constructing CAD/CAM systems should be to achieve man-model communication, a higher function than man-machine communication. Man-machine communication deals with the input and output devices required for the exchange of information between a computer and a user; man-model communication deals with the interactions necessary to define, interrogate, and confirm the computer-based model. In this article we refer to such interaction as "dialogue." The model involved in the dialogue is typically stored in virtual memory and often involves transfer via a data base management system. To achieve successful man-model dialogue, a designer must have not only the tools and protocols of man-machine communication, but also an unobstructed sense of the model and a feeling of free interaction.

Available work stations

Work stations, as we know them, take several different forms. They are usually categorized by their graphics capabilities, their processing power, their program mobility, and their local storage capacity. One of the most common types is a configuration consisting of a storage tube display and a data tablet, supported by a small minicomputer, possibly with a floppy disk for the convenience of local storage and filing. This kind of station, offering a manual cursor and a high quality line drawing display, is a relatively inexpensive facility. Relative erasure is not possible and regeneration of the screen image is a slow process not amenable to animation or intelligent dialogs. It is a facility for convenient option selection, for static presentation of small engineering drawings, and for pointing at and positioning items relative to a fixed layout. The station is entirely dependent on the software capabilities of the local computer. Its virtues are low cost, good line quality, and effective interaction for 2-D pointing and verification.

Very powerful and sophisticated graphics work stations are now appearing in production environments in the form of high-quality, refresh vector graphics terminals with 3-D transformation hardware and program enable display buffer functions. These terminals, often referred to as graphic engines, are interconnected with a data tablet and programable keyboard, and may have hardware support for clipping and perspective depth calculations as well as automatic depth queuing. There are examples of models intended for real-time (programmable) viewing of 3-D wire-frame geometric models, with real-time motion calculation sustaining 3-D depth illusion. This type of work station might have a coordinated radial with local mass storage to support the development of a graphic data base and applications. Major filing and composing capacity is derived from a remote large mainframe.

A third distinctive category of work station, offered mostly by turnkey vendors as part of a complete hardware/software system, facilitates data capture and production-quality drafting. Most of these systems feature a large digitizer plotter, capable of highly accurate digitizing over its large plotting area and its quality, large scale production drawings. Data capture is the primary activity for users of these relatively restricted graphics stations. The user methodically, and possibly laboriously, inputs
