TINA ALSTER, M.D., Washington Institute of Dermatologic Surgery, Washington, D.C.

JOON TIAN TAN, M.D., Laser Research Laboratory, Boston City Hospital, Boston, Massachusetts

Benign cutaneous vascular lesions have been treated with a wide array of modalities. Lasers are a comparatively new form of treatment for cutaneous blood vessel abnormalities. Initially, results following laser treatment were disappointing, primarily because of widespread thermal injury to surrounding normal tissue. Recent developments in laser technology and the introduction of the tunable dye laser offer the ability to selectively target laser energy at specific chromophores such as oxyhemoglobin. The technique of selective photothermolysis provides successful treatment of benign vascular lesions with minimal damage to adjacent structures.

Although benign cutaneous vascular lesions such as hemangiomas and vascular malformations are rarely life-threatening, treatment is often sought when organ function is compromised or when the lesion darkens in color, bleeds or imposes a psychologic burden on the patient.<sup>1</sup> Various treatments have been used to remove such lesions, including surgery, ionizing radiation, cryotherapy, sclerotherapy, tattooing with flesh-colored pigments, dermabrasion, electrocautery and intralesional or systemic steroids.<sup>2-9</sup>

Scarring has been associated with most, if not all, of these treatments. Each modality also carries specific potential disadvantages. Surgery is associated with the possibility of postoperative complications such as infection and hemorrhage. Complications of radiation therapy include skin necrosis, epiphyseal damage, cataracts, breast hypoplasia, lymphoma, thyroid and testicular carcinoma, and other malignancies.<sup>10,11</sup> In spite of serious systemic side effects, high-dose intralesional or systemic steroids have been successfully used to treat certain rapidly enlarging hemangiomas that threaten vital organs such as the eyes. Until the introduction of lasers, the limitations imposed by these different therapies often made cosmetic camouflage with opaque makeup, such as Covermark® and Dermablend®, the only safe and acceptable treatment.

Lasers have been used in the treatment of benign cutaneous vascular lesions since the mid-1960s. A ruby laser, with emission in the red wavelength at 694 nm, was the first laser used to eradicate lesions such as port-wine stains.<sup>12</sup> Because of the relatively low absorption advantage of hemoglobin at this wavelength (Figure 1), the ruby laser lacks vascular specificity, and nonspecific thermal injury of the irradiated site results.
