

party that suffered considerable hardship in the creation of Bangladesh to a party the leadership of which plundered the society in almost every way it could;

- the reasons for 'corruption and misuse of power leading to the wasting of almost 40 per cent of the total resources set apart for development' (p. 259) in spite of the fact that Bangladeshi society had the tradition of spiritual regeneration brought about by the Wahabi and Faraizi movements;
- the role that needs to be played by political parties, the government, the business leaders, the academic and religious institutions in creating a climate for rapid economic development.

Readers wanting to provide their own answers to these questions will find the book useful. The book also provides a good profile of Bangladesh society today, although needless repetition is on occasion jarring and distracting.

Rama Murthy Kuppachi, Managing by Consultation: Global and Asian Experiences, New Delhi: Sage Publications, 1992, pp. 226.

The book under review is an attempt, as claimed by the author, to provide a global view of participatory management from an Asian perspective, focusing on India and Sri Lanka. In effect, it provides a 'fast forward' glimpse of not only what is intended but also of a wide range of theoretical propositions in the field of human relations and productivity. At the end of my perusal of what Kuppachi has put together, I thought I had tasted a casually cooked menu with an international mix of dishes, none of which left a lingering, let alone lasting, effect on my academic appetite.

The book opens with a preamble designed to serve as a backdrop to labour-management participative models and practices. The content of the introductory chapter, however, does not rise above a rapid and facile summary of conceptual material on the behavioural view of the management process, especially leadership and management styles. It appears that the author, while aiming at a contribution in scholarship in participative management, could not resist the temptation to make his product attractive to students being initiated into the study of human relations in
