Arte Povera (Italian: "poor art") was a movement in Italy that emerged in the early 1960s. It was a reaction to the traditional Italian art scene, which was dominated by the Academy of Fine Arts. The movement was characterized by its use of everyday materials, such as earth, stone, and wood, and its focus on the process of creation rather than the final product. The artists associated with the movement, including Giuseppe Penone, Mario Merz, and Jannis Kounellis, sought to challenge the traditional hierarchy of art and to explore the relationship between the artist and the material.
