

Molecular Machinery: A Tour of the Protein Data Bank

Cells and many complex molecular machines that perform the biological jobs needed for the lives of these organisms are molecular machines that can be described as machines. (Often they are not machines in the traditional sense of the word, but they are machines in the sense that they are made of parts that work together to perform a specific function.)

Structures around the world are studying these molecules at the atomic level. These structures are made available in the Protein Data Bank (PDB), the central repository of macromolecular structures. In the examples from the PDB, structures are shown in the form of a ribbon diagram, a representation of the structure that is both clear and informative. The ribbon diagram of a molecule is a representation of the structure that is both clear and informative.
