

Geophysical Survey in the Archaeological Record:

The Archaeological Investigations Project

Bronwen Russell & Timothy Darvill
School of Conservation Sciences, Bournemouth University

With the advent of PPG14 (Planning Policy Guidance note 14) in 1999, archaeology in England has developed within a detailed outline (current version: Government Review). This has seen the use of geophysical techniques as a rapid evaluation tool in planning and archaeology (Figure 1). This new important survey can greatly enhance the known archaeology of a site and its surrounding environs, for the cost of evaluation it can be an invaluable way of locating features to target the archaeology. The variety of methods and availability (investment types) means that the most appropriate method can be chosen for a project and by combining a number of methods a very detailed picture of the site can often be built up. Personal and public research projects also utilize geophysical survey techniques providing an essential research tool with quickly accessible results that can be used to enhance the need for further work, and develop future strategies (see Figure 2).

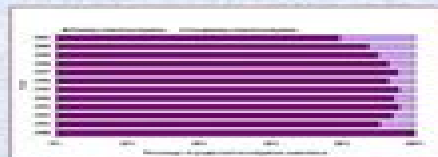

Figure 2. Proportion of planning-related to research-related non-planning geophysical investigations recorded in England 1996-2000.

The Archaeological Investigations Project, funded by English Heritage, seeks to record and provide a picture of all archaeological investigations undertaken in England, year by year. It provides details of archaeological interventions for each county and survey authority in England and is the only systematically researched up to date record of its kind in England. The project researchers visit all county councils, commercial units and organisations that undertake regional fieldwork, while other sources are contacted for ground surveys. In addition to this, AIP has recently published Archaeology after PPG14, an archaeological investigation in England 1996-2000 (2001). An analysis of the changing character and distribution of archaeological work in England since the introduction of PPG14.

The development and availability of affordable, more timely equipment and data processing packages means that more active local archaeological involvement can afford at least basic monitoring equipment. This provides a useful non-invasive research tool which enables us to employ the broader local knowledge of archaeological sites and potentially contribute immensely to the enhancement of the local SMITHS (Sites and Monuments Record Heritage Environment Record).

For these local government and commercial units that now offer geophysical survey in their repertoire of archaeological services. The number of specialist geophysical companies have grown significantly and within a range of commercial and non-profit (Figure 6) to address the requirements. Apart from the local market it also becomes a very cost-effective way of obtaining ground truthing for archaeological projects. The Council for Independent Archaeology have been developing a list of specialist units and at least 25 units are currently in use by CEA members. The more affordable commercial and cost of use to the surveyor means that many public commercial archaeological units pursue their own equipment.

This alignment that an increasing number of geophysical surveys have been undertaken by a greater number of organisations just on their own the past decade (Figure 7), and that a wealth of information is becoming available. AIP aims to record these events and map the trends which they analysis reveals.

AIP has always recorded geophysical surveys which form part of a broader evaluation consisting of a number of archaeological techniques, specialist geophysical surveys were recorded on the English Heritage Geophysical Survey Database. The CEA contains details of all AIP geophysical surveys dating back to 1972, as well as a large number of other surveys carried out by other organisations and individuals, either registered as a requirement of government for surveys to be conducted on a scheduled ancient monument, locally within AIC of the Historic Monuments, or used by individuals to be included in the database.

The proliferation of geophysical surveys during the 1990s (Figure 8) means, however, that a more comprehensive approach was needed for tracking down and recording the events, extent and distribution of geophysical surveys of all kinds. These data collections (2001) onwards for events undertaken in England now include all geophysical survey work. It is hoped that this sample that be used to support and enhance already existing data sets.

Initial analysis has produced some interesting results, such as the increasing dependence on equipment in the primary survey techniques and the dramatic increase in the use of GPR in archaeological investigations. One of the aims is to compare to data collection from county by will be more comprehensive and therefore more easily comparable on a national scale.
