Abstract

The world is observing a rapid shift in the burden of diseases with predominance of noncommunicable diseases (NCDs). NCDs contribute to 41 million deaths which is equivalent to 74% of all death globally per year. There is ongoing debate on the approaches to reduce public exposure to NCDs' modifiable risk factors which are of economic potential. As the World Health Organization and the World Bank recommend the implementation of taxation to these factors, still questions arise on the effectiveness, sustainability, and practicality of this strategy. With the ongoing transition globally from consumption of natural to processed foods, it is important to counter-check the best interventions on how to protect people from unhealthy eating behaviors. While taxation on unhealthy food and other products like tobacco has been recommended as one among interventional approaches, its effectiveness on sugar sweetened beverages is not reliable compared to approaches that increase self-control. Despite the perceived economic benefits of tobacco and sugar sweetened products, there is detrimental implication in terms of public health. The introduction of taxation which favors public health faces challenges due to conflict of interest from government authorities and other stakeholders. The intertwined relationship between public health and economic development becomes more obvious during implementation of preventive and control measures against modifiable risk factors for NCDs. It is evident that reaching a balanced rational decision on choosing between economic growth and public health is difficult. Countries should enhance both local and international intersectoral and multi-sectoral approaches in creating integrative policies which include health component in all non-health policies including economic policies so as to harmonize public health and economic growth during this era of extensive globalization.

Population Policy Research Priorities In The Developing World:

Population Policy Carmen A. Miró, International Review Group of Social Science Research on Population and Development, Joseph E. Potter, 1980 Perspectives on Development and Population Growth in the Third World O.G. Simmons, 2012-12-06 Until the early to mid 1970s social scientists in the fields of population and development were largely going their own ways Demographers relied almost exclusively on demographic transition theory as their paradigm for understanding the role of development in population change and fertility decline Conversely most development economists and other specialists were certainly aware of the constraints placed upon development objectives by population growth However the main development theories paid little attention to population and the implications of population growth for development Indeed it was not until after the World Population Conference in Bucharest in 1974 that the interaction of population and development became a serious and positive theme for social scientific study Accordingly since about the mid 1970s an extensive literature in the field of population and development has been generated And in 1975 under the auspices of The Population Council the journal Population and Development Review was founded a journal which in the past decade has developed into the premier publication in the world for work in this area But our understanding of development as it refers to change in Third World countries remained fragmented Moreover our understanding of the linkages and interactions between population and development was very limited It is in this regard that Ozzie Simmons's Perspectives on Development and Population Growth in the Third World will certainly have an impact International population policy issues and choices for the United States. , 1987 Third World Cities John D. Kasarda, Allan M. Parnell, 1993 Gathering an internationally renowned group of scholars in urbanization and development studies this work explores the impact of internal and international migration on cities in the Third World Vital issues such as demographic trends economic development environmental impact welfare and housing policy are examined across a variety of geographic locations The book will be an invaluable resource for anyone engaged in policy or programme work in Third World development Development in the Third World: From Policy Failure to Policy Reform Kempe Ronald Hope, Sr., 2016-09-16 This book is a study of Third World economic development and the factors which have made development so elusive It discusses the policy reform necessary to spur development as well as the relationship between development theory and policy The author argues that the key to successful development policy is through reduced state intervention and that to the extent state intervention is necessary it should be through rather than against the market mechanism Special Bibliography Series , 1957

Berelson on Population John A. Ross, W. Parker Mauldin, 2012-12-06 Bernard Barney Berelson had a major influence in the application of social science concepts and methods to population policy during the period from 1962 to 1980 This was the period when concern with population problems spread from a relatively small group of scholars and population activists to a much larger diverse international group of political and intellectual leaders and to the general public as well There was an exponential growth in the number of scholars and service personnel in various population and family specialities in this period Barney came into the field with his appointment as Director of the Communication Research Program of The Population Council in 1962 He had no previous training or experience in demography Frank Notestein President of The Population Council at the time had the wisdom to appreciate the value and relevance of Barney's impressive background in communication research and other social science areas as well as his creative mind and leadership qualities His influence on the Council's rapidly expanding program was so immediate and impressive that within a year he was named Vice President When Frank Notestein retired in 1968 Barney became President a post he held for 6 very productive years

Population Growth, Income Distribution, and Economic Development Nico Heerink,2012-12-06 In this book a model of long term interrelationships between income distribution population growth and economic development is developed and estimated from data for 54 countries The results indicate that a reduction of income inequality leads to lower fertility and mortality to improved basic needs satisfaction and to lower labour force participation of young and old males and of females in Asia and Africa The effect of income distribution on saving and consumption is found to be negligible These outcomes suggest that family planning and health policies in LDCs will show better results when they are supplemented with policies aimed at making the poor benefit from economic growth As regards development policy the results indicate that a reduction of income inequality does not impair the formation of physical capital but enhances the formation of human capital and lowers the growth rate of the labour force The Journal of Developing Areas ,1983
