

The Philosophy of Civilization

CHAPTER I

TEMPORAL AND ETERNAL

I. Spin a roulette wheel once, and it is impossible to foretell what number the ball will seek. Spin the same wheel, under the same conditions, a million times, and it is possible to foretell the result with mathematical exactness. If the wheel be true, so that equality of opportunity is offered to the little ball, it will fall into each numbered compartment an equal number of times. In a million plays it will come red as often as black; odd as often as even. This result will come with mathematical certainty with each succeeding million, as long as equality of opportunity is preserved. If, at the end of the first million, there appears the tiniest fraction of discrepancy between the various numbers, that fraction will be corrected in succeeding millions. There will never be a continuous departure from equality; but the actual result will forever oscillate near and forever return to it, so that no one number, and no group of numbers, whether odd or even, or red or black, will establish a permanent ascendancy. Whatever variation there is from this exact equality, is temporary and apparent only; the variation, even in a much smaller group than a million plays, will never exceed the proportion of 36 to 37.

Arrange a million roulette wheels in a square plane, one thousand to a side. Spin them simultaneously. If, again, each wheel is true so that equality of opportunity is offered
