almost all strolls of regular life in China except in the Culinary Art of China. In fact, foreign groceries have been introduced in China in the dawn of history yet they all became integral to Chinese food. Clearly, Chinese culinary heritage through the ages of refinement and development, however, the Chinese unaltered method of cooking and serving food remains basically unaltered. Although the bronze age around 1850 BC and the Chinese had utilised the bronze cleaver for cutting food into small pieces and cooking them in small pots utilizing a bronze tripod and the wooden wok. They did not demonstrate the technique as Zhou did in the twelfth century BC. The Chinese used various rice wines and flavors in the cooking and the blend of muddled cooking techniques were recorded by the famous Chinese great sage CONFUCIUS 551-479 BC who was an acknowledged gourmet. Also, it was recorded that the merit of warmth application and blending of different flavors were highly valued in Chinese cooking and the employment of high and low heat and the blending of interesting and bitter and sweet flavors were all given their respective applications as requested by the human body. This thorough congruity is one of the merits of Chinese food.
