The swift march of urban expansion across the globe brings with it a multitude of transformations. One central issue, often overshadowed by economic and social discussions, is the profound impact of urbanization on our planet's biodiversity. As cities expand, habitats shrink, ecosystems are disrupted, and many species face the threat of extinction. This essay will delve into the multifaceted relationship and impacts between urban development and biodiversity loss, utilizing key case studies and expert assessments to highlight the magnitude and implications of this environmental challenge. A particular focus will be on the effects of urban sprawl on freshwater ecosystems, setting the stage for a detailed exploration in the subsequent sections of the paper.
