Singapore's Foreign Policy: Coping with Vulnerability

Michael Leifer

London, Routledge, 2000, 177 pp.

The rise of Singapore from a mere trading post to a society with one of the highest living standards in the world in just three decades has generated keen international interest. Many economists have attempted to identify and analyse the factors that have contributed to Singapore's successful transformation, but few commentators have touched on its foreign policy and diplomacy in this context. Michael Leifer, who devoted his four-decade academic life to analysing politics and international relations in South-east Asia, attempts to fill the gap by delineating Singapore's diplomatic endeavours to manipulate the problematic relations with its bigger neighbours, including Malaysia and Indonesia, between which this small state is wedged. In November 2000, Indonesian President Wahid, unhappy with Singapore's rejection of his proposal to include East Timor and Papua New Guinea in the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN), urged Malaysia to form an alliance with a view to cutting off Singapore's water supply. This incident upset a number of Singaporeans who saw how easily their security could be jeopardized by their neighbours. Leifer argues that antagonism towards Singapore in Malaysia and Indonesia has been its 'primary political fear', and that political unpredictability in both countries has an adversarial impact on Singapore's foreign policy approaches. Leifer thus insists that the principal objective of Singapore's foreign policy is to cope with this innate vulnerability.

Leifer stresses that Singapore's primary means of coping with this vulnerability has been to conduct diplomacy on a balance-of-power basis, which, in Singapore's case, aims to 'deny a hegemonic position on the part of states judged likely to harm the interests of the Republic' (p. 9). In this sense, 'the multiple involvement within the regional locale of important extra-regional states, especially the United States, has been encouraged as a practical way of coping with vulnerability and complementing a national defence capability' (p. 26). Therefore, Leifer regards even Singapore's 'exceptionalism in its
