Morris Birkbeck and English farmer emigrated to America in 1817 and settled in Illinois. He was not just another poor emigrant; however, in England he had leased an estate of 1 500 acres and had kept abreast of the latest agricultural techniques. He possessed considerable capital and when he arrived in the United States determined to establish a colony for himself and other emigrants in the Illinois Territory. His Notes on a Journey In America from the Coast of Virginia to the Territory of Illinois first printed in 1817 extolled the advantages of settlement in the Illinois prairies.

Excerpt 1 G3 an air of neatness and the roads themselves are better attended to than in Virginia and the western parts of Pennsylvania or even in the neighbourhood of the federal city where they are so busily employed in ornamental architecture. This morning we had the pleasure of meeting a group of nymphs with their attendant swains ten in number on horseback for no American walks who can obtain a horse and there are few indeed who cannot. The young men were carrying umbrellas over the heads of their fair partners fair by courtesy and as there was no shew of Sundays best about them we were the more pleased with their decent respectable appearance. We had also the pleasure of meeting a drove of very fat oxen on their way from the banks of the Miami to Philadelphia. They might on the average weigh six hundred pounds cost about thirty dollars and sell at Philadelphia at about fifty or fifty five dollars per head. June 14 Eighteen miles east of Zanesville taking shelter from a thunder storm we were joined by four industrious pedestrians returning eastward from a tour of observation through this state which is no unusual thing among labourers and artisans who travel about and stop occasionally to work at their callings when their finances require a supply. All a DEGREESree in one sentiment that there is no part of the union in the new settlements or the old where an industrious man need be at a loss for the comforts of a good livelihood. One of them a hatter resolves to remain in his old position in Philadelphia. There are in this western country more artisans than materials. Shoemakers are standing still for want of leather and tanners for want of hides. The land continues of the same character.

Excerpt from Notes on a Journey in America From the Coast of Virginia to the Territory of Illinois That institutions favourable to virtue shall produce effects correspondent to their character upon the society blessed with them is a conclusion so natural that we should be inclined to suspect an error in our estimate of the institutions themselves if we found a vicious people under a good government
