

The Land Use Act and the Nigerian Housing Sector

I. Introduction

The Nigerian Land use Act of 1978 abolished the existing land tenure systems and replaced them with a uniform Land Administration system across the Country. Prior to the Act, there were three land tenure systems. They were the customary which was essentially based on the customs and traditions of the various communities with the Chief, community or family head holding the land in trust for family or community use; the non-customary, based on the received English Law (operational mainly in the then Lagos Colony) which vested the land on the British Crown but also allowed for either freeholding or lease holding with tenured occupancy; and special native-favoured system of Northern Nigeria which put the land under the control of the Governor for the use and benefit of the Natives of the Region. All the existing tenure systems encouraged land holding without an obligation to develop them, fragmentation and uncoordinated alienation, hoarding speculatively for value appreciation and without precise documentation.

The Land Use Act was therefore designed to achieve the following objectives (Salami, 2014):

- i. Make land easily accessible to all Nigerians
- ii. Prevent speculative purchases of communal land
- iii. Streamline and simplify the management and ownership of land
- iv. Make land available to government at all levels for development
- v. Provide the system of Government administration of rights that will improve tenure security

If these objectives were achieved by the Act ultimately, the questions to be addressed is whether the challenges posed by the Land use Act for housing and the overall investment in property development were operation-induced or perpetrated by the provisions therein.
