Harlow,2019 Schools must adapt to the needs of the 21st century learner Relevant meaningful curriculum with important implications toward students needs and cultures through their biographies psychologies and sociologies brings value to the learner school and society This instrumental single case study sought to explore how a specific curriculum developed for this study I Am Me THOUGHTS of Buoyancy could teach an understanding of self esteem to sixth graders that would then be potentially exhibited in art making and reflection While the curriculum unit developed for this study had six art projects and eight lesson plans the I Am Me Storyboard art project was the central focus of data analysis Buoyancy was used as a metaphor to assist in teaching the meaning of self esteem Instrumental case study was implemented by the examination of the case for larger implications in 21st century art education By investigating the development of an intercultural classroom through art activities and art making and by using the art curriculum for social emotional learning the curriculum was analyzed for its usefulness in providing meaningful learning above and beyond art content within middle school art classes Arts Based Research Leavy 2018 was the theoretical framework for the study building on the work of Eisner 2002 and Dewey 1934 The study was a meta synthesis of art education curriculum storytelling and biopsychosocial education with a pedagogical focus on Culturally Responsive Teaching Gay 2018 and Biography Driven Instruction Herrera 2016 This study built upon the research of early adolescent self esteem by DuBois Felner Brand Phillips and Lease 1996 which categorized evidence of self esteem into the five categories of family friends activities body image and school The acronym EASEA was developed during this study to represent Early Adolescent Self esteem Analysis encompassing these five categories of self esteem The intent of the student artists the participants was analyzed using visual verbal and vervisual examination The term vervisual was developed for this study to represent a third zone of communication in which visual and verbal communication are used in tandem to inform meaning A variety of data sources were used including field notes interviews information provided by students parents or guardians and five different artistic phases of the storyboard that included the art making and a written or verbal artist statement for each phase Findings of the study revealed that students told recognizable visual and verbal stories depicting components of self esteem in a variety of ways Students told stories in implicit or explicit ways that sometimes needed both the visual artifact and the verbal statement to be fully understood Students felt empowered by having control over how much of their story they chose to tell Through their art making and written or verbal artist statements many students chose to share joyous aspects of their lives reflecting things they loved that brought them laughter or that represented their lives Herrera 2016 Students shared biopsychosocial aspects of their lives and their social emotional needs were addressed through the planned curriculum or given an opportunity to be explored By choice some students shared difficult aspects of their personal lives Data revealed that all ten trauma reflecting communications were first completed as drawings in the geometric design phase where students drew a symbol representing their past present and future Findings revealed that after students first drew an image they then felt freer to write a written description of what they had drawn Another unique finding of the study was that the various components of students storyboards depicted a visual rhythm or movement that cohesively and aesthetically conveyed a vervisual language unique to each student The study was also particularly revealing with newcomer refugee students and recent immigrants giving them a platform to share their experiences prior to going to school in the United States and expressing the importance of their culture The findings indicate that curriculum such as I Am Me THOUGHTS of Buoyancy has a place in art education that university pre service art education programs should investigate the inclusion of social emotional learning courses for students majoring in art education and that art educators should work with school counselors in developing art curriculum that addresses character traits and other issues of concern with middle school students

Self-Esteem in Time and Place Peggy J. Miller,Grace E. Cho,2017-11-01 The concept of self esteem is a fixture in the psychological and moral landscape of American society This is especially true in the arena of childrearing images and references to self esteem are ubiquitous in academic educational and popular media Yet until now little has been known about what self esteem means to parents or how self esteem infiltrates everyday practices Self Esteem in Time and Place reveals how self esteem became a touchstone of American childrearing in the early years of the 21st century At the heart of this book is the Millennial study an empirical investigation of diverse families in one Midwestern town European American African American middle class and working class parents of young children embraced self esteem as a childrearing goal and believed that fostering children s self esteem was critical to their psychological health and future success To achieve this goal they enacted a high maintenance style of childrearing comprised of assiduous monitoring copious praise and gentle discipline These practices differed dramatically from most cultural cases in the ethnographic record Together parents and children created an early moment in a child affirming developmental trajectory Three year olds developed a precocious ability to praise themselves and solicit praise from others As active participants and inventive agents children and parents alike engaged in a process of personalization nuancing their views in light of their social positioning and infusing normative ideas and practices with personal significance The result is an account of unparalleled depth and nuance that situates childrearing and self esteem in time and place traces its roots to 19th century visionaries and identifies the complex multi layered contexts from which this enduring cultural ideal derives its meanings

Self Esteem and Academic Achievement in Middle School Students Brian Kitchin,2020 This study investigates the connection between the academic side of learning and the social emotional More specifically this study looks at one specific social emotional category self esteem and examines the possibility of a correlation to academic success Using a well established quantifiable measure of self esteem The Coopersmith Self Esteem Inventory and each of its embedded self esteem subscores General Self Social Self Home Parent Self School Academic Self the self esteem level of 51 volunteer participants were established Each participant was middle school aged Grades 6 8 and was a current student at a middle school in Middlesex County New Jersey Using a multiple regression these Coopersmith scores were individually compared to grades in core academic subjects Math ELA Science and Social Studies as well as NJSLA standardized assessment scores in Math and ELA The results varied for the different conducted tests Overall a correlation was not found to exist between NJSLA scores and self esteem as determined by the Coopersmith Self Esteem Inventory However there was a positive correlation found to exist between grades in core academic subjects and participant self esteem The correlation was not strong enough to be used as a predictor for individual student grades or self esteem level however a P value of greater than 95 for multiple Coopersmith subscores is indicative of a relationship between the two variables that is statistically significant This is evidence to suggest that as a whole middle school students with higher self esteem are also more likely to see an increase in academic success as well ProQuest abstract The Validation Plan James E. Pirkle PhD,2013-03-13 Whether we like to think about it or not our nations culture is awash with negativity incivility insults bickering self centeredness violence deaths and hate groups But there is a way to counteract these societal harms and resulting behaviors In The Validation Plan author James E Pirkle PhD gives a thorough presentation and analysis of a plan he developed to help students find the good in each other Implemented in hundreds of classrooms in kindergarten through twelfth grade in many different countries the Validation Program promotes responsible citizenship and sound character while reinforcing academic achievement Pirkle shows how validation can be defined as a curriculum program an integrated language arts program where each student is totally engaged in writing reading speaking and listening The Validation Plan outlines the positive reasons for using the program and it details how to successfully carry it out in schools Pirkle describes how the Validation Program engages and connects students while building the foundations for solid character development and he communicates how it also provides teachers with a way to build supportive and concrete relationships among all students subsequently creating a favorable classroom climate and positive school wide culture
